THE JIM CROW LAW

Now that the war emergency is over and traveling conditions and restrictions are no longer controlled by the Office of Defense Transportation in Washington, it is time that the fundamental Southern principle of segregation of the races be enforced. This applies particularly to bus travel.

Starting at the station, it is true that the terminal maintains separate waiting rooms, but in effect this is nullified. On the platforms there is a general mixture. When the buses start loading, since both races ride in the same compartment in the vehicles, there is pushing, scrouging, scrambling, shoving, hopeless confusion. It should be stopped. After loading, the buses are so packed that the standing passengers are "sardined" and sandwiched all together--white and black--no regard or respect for courtesy, politeness or manners. When passengers have to leave the buses, the same shoving and pushing is repeated because there is only one entrance and exit to the bus. All this should be stopped.

Now the railroads are compelled to maintain separate coaches for the two races. Why are the bus lines not required to have separate buses. It would help some if there were two entrances and two exits, but that would not solve the packing up of whites and blacks together. Of course, it may be argued that buses are constructed in sections where there is no segregation, and that in order to have separate entrances and exits and a dividing partition, the design of the coaches would have to be changed. But the fact remains that without a separation the law is being violated.

With all the common carriers buying new equipment it should be seen to that sufficient rolling stock is provided to correct these conditions, and if the present carriers do not comply steps should be taken to afford other remedies.

Honorable Ellis Arnall
Governor of Georgia
Governor's Mansion
205 The Prado, N. E.
Atlanta, Georgia

Dear Governor Arnall:

Enclosed are galley proofs of a study of the South by Rupert B. Vance of the University of North Carolina which will be published by us next month. We feel that, in view of your interests and your leadership in the movement for Southern development, it would be appropriate to have you do an introduction to the pamphlet.

What we want is a brief introduction of about 300 to 500 words, calling attention to the value of the study as a part of understanding and working on the problems of the South. If you are too busy at the moment to read the study, I think you can get by with a general statement of the South's needs and possibilities based on your own knowledge and experience. It would help if you said something about the need for all Southerners to mobilize to study and work, on both the local and Southwide levels, to develop the region's potentialities.

The title of the study is "Wanted: The South's Future for the Nation." We hope to have it off the press by the middle of March. This means that we must start printing within the next week, and if possible I would like to have your introduction by the end of this week. I know I should have gotten in touch with you earlier, but we received the galley proofs only a few days ago.

Your good cooperation will be deeply appreciated by the Council. Having your introduction in the book will add a great deal to its prestige and insure it a much wider readership.

Sincerely,

Ray Warwick
Director of Public Relations

P.S. We are enclosing a few recent publications to let you see what we are doing and how we are going after new members.

GENTLEMEN: YOU ARE MAD!

By LEWIS MUMFORD*

We in America are living among madmen. Madmen govern our affairs in the name of order and security. The chief madmen claim the titles of general, admiral, senator, scientist, administrator, Secretary of State, even President. And the fatal symptom of their madness is this: they have been carrying through a series of acts which will lead eventually to the destruction of mankind, under the solemn conviction that they are normal responsible people, living sane lives, and working for reasonable ends.

Soberly, day after day, the madmen continue to go through the undeviating motions of madness: motions so stereotyped, so commonplace, that they seem the normal motions of normal men, not the mass compulsions of people bent on total death. Without a public mandate of any kind, the madmen have taken it upon themselves to lead us by gradual stages to that final act of madness which will corrupt the face of the earth and blot out the nations of men, possibly put an end to all life on the planet itself.

These madmen have a comet by the tail, but they think to prove their sanity by treating it as if it were a child's skyrocket. They play with it; they experiment with it; they dream of swifter and brighter comets. Their teachers have handed them down no rules for controlling comets; so they take only the usual precautions of children permitted to set off firecrackers. Without asking for anyone's permission, they have decided to play a little further with this cosmic force, merely to see what will happen at sea in a war that must never come.

Why do we let the madmen go on with their game without raising our voices? Why do we keep our glassy calm in the face of this danger? There is a reason: we are madmen, too. We view the madness of our leaders as if it expressed a traditional wisdom and a common sense: we view them placidly, as a doped policeman might view with a blank, tolerant leer the robbery of a bank or the barehanded killing of a child or the setting of an infernal machine in a railroad station. Our failure to act is the measure of our madness. We look at the madmen and pass by.

Truly, those are infernal machines that our elected and appointed madmen are setting. When the machines go off, the cities will explode, one after another, like a string of firecrackers, burning and blasting every vestige of life to a crisp. We know that the madmen are still making these machines, and we do not even ask them for what reason, still less do we bring their work to a halt. So we, too, are madmen: madmen living among madmen: unmoved by the horror that moves swiftly toward us. We are thinking only of the next hour, the next day, the next week, and that is further proof that we are mad; for if we go on in this fashion, tomorrow will be more heavy with death than a mortuary. Once our rivals enter the atomic armament race there will be no drawing back this side total catastrophe. The madmen expect that forty million people will be killed during the first few hours in the land that fails to unloose the infernal machine first. No promise to hold back such weapons until we ourselves are attacked will remain firm in the face of such expectations and such anxiety. The nation that waits before it is attacked will be lost, and the nation that attacks a foe that is equally armed, the armed madmen admit, will also be lost. Once the atomic war breaks out, the planet will become our extermination camp, and the cities will be our incinerators. This will be the madmen's final homage to the Mad Leader of all Madmen, who, dying, has scattered about this dust of madness which blinds our eyes and numbs our senses.

Why has this madness seized us? Do not ask now; it is here. Have we then no sanity left that will give us strength to cry out against the madmen and contend with them? Have we not the power to stifle the infernal machines they have created and to baffle their preparations for the casual suicide of the human race? Has no one raised a hand to halt the madmen? Yes: here and there, in the gutters, on the rooftops, pushed through a grating, or slipped under a door by a silent hand, are the scrawls of a message, a frantic series of messages, addressed to all of us. These messages have been written by the greatest of the madmen, the men who invented the super-infernal machine itself; the men who, in the final throes of their dementia, were shocked back into sanity.

The shocked ones, the awakened ones, are the only people who show a normal awareness of danger, and the proof of this fact is that their frantic signals are dismissed as madness. The louder they shout to us, the more inaudible their voices become. The moment they awakened to the cosmic evil they had brought about, the awakened ones were bound over to silence by the watchful agents of the uniformed madmen. So they send us their messages in scattered fragments, or they whisper it to private ears in passing, since their keepers will not permit them to speak aloud in such a fashion that every man, woman, and child would understand their story and act for self-preservation.

The ruling madmen do not dare to let us read the whole message of the imprisoned ones, lest we be suddenly jolted into sanity. The President, the generals, the admirals, the administrators are afraid that their own madness might become more evident if the scattered words the awakened ones set us were to be put together and read as a single sentence. For the President, the generals, the admirals, and the administrators have lied to us about their infernal machine: they have lied by their statements and even more they have lied by their silences. They lie because it is no longer an infernal machine, but hundreds of infernal machines: presently no longer hundreds but thousands: these unrestrained madmen will soon have enough power to disembowel, with a push-button command, all the living spaces of mankind. Day by day the stockpiles of chaos grow larger.

The power that the madmen hold is power of an order that the sane alone know that they are not sane enough to use. But the madmen do not want us to know that their power is too absolute, too godlike, to be placed in any human hands: for the madmen dandle the infernal machine jauntily in their laps and their hands eagerly tremble to push the button. They smile at us, these madmen: they pose for fresh photographs, still smiling: they say, being madmen, "We are as optimistic as ever," and their insane grin is prophetic of the catastrophe that awaits us.

Lying to us about the secret that is no secret, the madmen also lie to themselves, to give their lie the further appearance of truth, and their madness the outward garb of sanity. Not knowing any other use for their machine but destruction, they multiply our capacities for destruction. Their every act is an act of madness; even now, in the middle of the Pacific Ocean, they plan a further madness, with a monkey-like curiosity to discover a new secret that is no secret. One mad act has led to a second mad act, the second to a third: and the end will be a morbid compulsion to achieve the last irretrievable act of world-madness—in the interests of security, peace, and truth.

*We are proud to be able to offer this arresting article to our readers. Permission to re-publish it was given us by the Saturday Review of Literature and by the author himself; indeed, Mr. Mumford revised his copy somewhat, in the interest of still greater effectiveness, for our use in The Christian Union Herald. Lewis Mumford has to his credit a long list of books and articles, as well as many activities and achievements in the field of American culture. Among the titles of his books are, "Herman Melville," "The Golden Day," "Faith for Living," "The Condition of Man." We hope the article that follows will be read by every one of our subscribers.—The Editor.

The madmen act as if nothing were happening, as if nothing were going to happen: they are taking the madman's usual precautions with a madman's usual confidence. But the awakened ones, those who are still the madmen's prisoners, know better than this. The pleading words they have guardedly sent us have been lying around for months, and only our paralyzed bodies and our dead minds have kept us from picking the fragments up and piecing them together. Let us read their plain message: it is the only warning we will ever have.

Here is the message of the awakened ones:

"The madmen are planning the end of the world. What they call continued progress in atomic warfare means universal extermination, and what they call national security is organized suicide. As our power approaches infinity, our security falls to zero. There is only one duty for the moment: every other task is a dream and a mockery. Stop the atomic bomb. Stop making the bomb. Suppress the bomb completely. Dismantle every existing bomb. Cancel every plan for the bomb's use; for these clever plans are based on stark madness. Either dethrone the madmen immediately or raise such a shout of protest as will shock them into sanity. We have seen the infernal machine in action, and we hold that this action is not for man to invoke.

"We know there is no quick way out of this madness, for the cooperation of mankind cannot be purchased cheaply by terror; but the first step, the only effective preliminary step, is to put an end to the atomic bomb. You cannot talk like sane men around a peace table while the atomic bomb is ticking beneath it. Do not treat the atomic bomb as a weapon of offense: do not treat it as a weapon of retaliation: do not treat it as an instrument of the police. Treat the bomb for what it actually is: the visible insanity of a civilization that has ceased to worship life and obey the laws of life. Do not use atomic energy in any form until controls and safeguards have been tested for at least half a generation. Say that as men we are too proud to will the rest of mankind's destruction even if that madness could for a few meaningless extra moments save ourselves. Say that we are too wise to imagine that our life would have value or purpose, security or continuity, in a world blasted by terror or paralyzed by the threat of terror."

So reads the message of the awakened ones.

While the whole world writhes in a spasm of madness, let us in America be mad with a method, mad with a purpose. Let us say No to the atomic bomb rather than say No to life itself. Let us awaken the sleeping sanity of the peoples of the world by calling them together and showing them our guilty hands, our hands already stained with a madman's blood, still clenched in a madman's purpose, and then let us say these plain words:

"We have awakened. We are men once more. You have nothing to fear from us. We will dismantle our atomic bombs and allow you to put a guard over our stockpiles: America's sanity today shall be the world's sanity tomorrow. Whoever seeks to be sure as to our good intentions, let him come into our country, go where he pleases, and examine the most secret laboratories and factories. We have nothing to hide, except that which only madmen would continue to hide. With this act of faith, we have awakened from the nightmare of the infernal machine and our sleepwalking progress toward annihilation. Wake up! men and brothers on every continent. Let us all cease thinking that the cosmic power we hold is only a child's skyrocket. The atomic bomb is not for any of us to use—ever. Let us put it aside, as if it were unconceived and inconceivable. For we have nothing to fear from each other but our normal madness: the madness of those who would calmly bring the world to an end simply by dotting their i's and crossing their t's as they have always done. On any other terms but this common faith in our common cause, mankind is doomed."

Meanwhile, the clockwork in the infernal machine ticks and the final day draws near. The time has come for action: before it is too late the compulsive automatic motions of the madmen must be sternly halted. Let the awakened ones be ungagged, and let one of them be placed at the elbow of every man holding high public office, as the priest was once at the elbow of the king, to whisper the words "Humanity" and "One World" in the leader's ear, when he slips into the dead language of tribal isolation. The secret that is no secret must be forgotten: the security that is no security must be yielded up: the power that is annihilation must give way to the power that is birth.

So the first move toward sanity lies with us Americans. Our uniformed madmen, with their secret methods, their secret powers, secret stores of annihilation, multiplying daily, have awakened a great fear; and only a great act of generosity and faith will ease that fear. Single-handedly and high-handedly we have given rise to this fear; and single-handedly but humbly we must help our rivals to dissipate it. Unless we risk an act we shall not gain the time needed for the further works of conciliation, compromise, and cooperation. Without time, neither peace nor security can be organized. Let us build with our own hands a new sanity, firm enough to keep all madness in check. It would be better to meet failure with such a sanity than to court a corrupt success with further madness.

To make world control of atomic energy possible, let us first exercise self-control over the infernal machine. Let us stop the further manufacture of atomic bombs. Let us dismantle the bombs we have made and put our stockpile of fissionable materials under the guardianship of the United Nations. Let our Congress formally declare this country's readiness to submit to a complete system of inspection and control;.. and let it add its readiness to sponsor any constitutional changes that may be needed to make a world control work, provided that every other nation accepts these measures as equally binding. Let our self-government point the way to world government.

That way, and no other way, lies sanity. That way, and no other way, lies security. That way, and no other way, lies life. The nation that fails, during the coming year or two of grace and reflection, to follow our lead will brand itself as the enemy of mankind. Woe to the nation that so fails! Such a nation has surely dug its own grave. But woe to ourselves if, having a cosmic power in our hands, we become so drunk with pride, or so riddled with fear, that we fail to open a wide door to sanity and cooperation. Yes: woe to us, if having the leadership in the infernal arts, we fail to use our utmost efforts to restore understanding and peace. Woe to us, if we cling to our madness and call it might!

Only by heroic political action can we overcome the dangers we ourselves have created. Stop the Atomic Bomb now. That is the only order of the day. When we have performed this duty the next step will be visible, and the next duty will add a new safeguard against the smooth automatism of the madmen. But we must be quick to overcome our own madness. Already the clockwork is ticking faster, and the end—unless we act with the awakened ones—is closer than anyone yet dares to think.

Atomic Energy

RECEIVED
JUN 10 1946
Southern Regional Council

46 College Street, Hanover, New Hampshire

A group of us in Hanover have started a movement to redress the serious mistakes our country has made in the exploitation of the atomic bomb. We hope this movement will spread.

We start from the premise that the only effective means of controlling atomic weapons and atomic energy, ultimately, is through a world government capable of preventing war. The process of transition to a world government can and should be accelerated; but it cannot in all probability be quickened to the point that it will serve as an immediate safeguard against a final war of extermination.

Accordingly, we have sought in the enclosed petition to devise a short term policy. We hope thereby to remove the fear and suspicion that now poison international relations, and to make it possible for strong rival states, especially Russia, to accept promptly and faithfully the drastic controls necessary for world security. Only a very bold and generous move on the part of the United States can achieve this result. Since American initiative in creating atomic weapons has brought on the danger, we have the duty to lead the way toward world security. The purpose of the petition is to make our government to withdraw from its present effort to be pacemaker in an atomic armament race. Once that race begins, there will be no withdrawal this side of catastrophe.

We are not so quixotic as to suppose that atomic bombs will not be used if, before world control is established, a war should break out. The three measures we propose are intended to convince our rivals, before they are capable of retaliation, that we have no intentions of settling our differences by a surprise atomic attack. From the Russian standpoint, our ever-increasing stock-pile of atomic bombs is a direct threat to their security. We seek to remove from the minds of both the Russians and our own military leaders the belief that the American people would sanction a "preventive" war of extermination.

American military and scientific authorities agree that our present superiority in atomic weapons is only temporary. Once Russia has caught up, the United States would be far more vulnerable to attack than Russia is now. At the Senate hearings the Army's spokesman admitted that forty million Americans might be wiped out before we could even identify our enemy. Only madmen now believe that such a weapon is a guarantee of national security. Our sense of self-preservation demands that we take the lead in suppressing this weapon before we bring on, by our own actions, a period of unlimited terror followed by wholesale extermination.

Will you join us by putting the enclosed program into action? We believe that public meetings in every part of the country are the best way of attracting nationwide attention to the issue. Petitions such as the enclosed should be circulated independently as well. The original copies with signatures should be forwarded to the President, while certified copies should be sent directly to your Representatives, to your Senators, and to Senator Brien McMahon, Chairman of the Senate Committee on Atomic Energy. We do not want individual signatures from you. We want you to initiate group action.

Lewis Mumford

To the President and the Congress of the United States

Today we confront a growing danger which issues out of America's temporary leadership in the production of atomic bombs. The danger springs from the fact that our continued production of these weapons has roused fears that will undermine every effort toward the conciliation, compromise and cooperation essential to building a peaceful world order.

As atomic power expands, world security diminishes. Only World Government can save mankind from an ultimate war of extermination. The process of transition to a World Government can and should be accelerated. Meanwhile many honest political differences in policy and method and ideal must be overcome. If we are to achieve World Government, we must have time to settle these differences. To secure time for this purpose is the prime aim of the proposals we submit.

The undersigned believe that the people of the United States have the duty to lead the way in renouncing the very possibility of atomic warfare or any other means of wholesale extermination. No peace would be worth its name, if it were achieved by turning the earth itself into an extermination camp. We condemn further military experiments with atomic weapons as an unseemly contradiction to our professions of cooperation through the United Nations. We believe that our own actions must set a pattern for the far-sighted cooperation we hope to draw forth from our neighbors throughout the world.

We believe that the following measures will relieve the tensions our own one-sided action in manufacturing atomic bombs has created. These measures will make it easier for other nations to withdraw from an atomic armament race. They will give authority to the United Nations Atomic Commission to devise the far-reaching and drastic controls necessary for our own security as well as the world's, without fear that such controls might be whittled down or completely repudiated by the United States Government.

Therefore, we, the undersigned, citizens of the United States, earnestly petition the President and the Congress to take the following measures:

1. Declare our readiness to submit to a complete system of United Nations' inspection and control of atomic weapons and atomic energy, provided that at the same time these measures are accepted as equally binding on themselves by other members of the United Nations.

2. Stop our further manufacture of Atomic Bombs.

3. Dismantle the bombs we have made and place our stockpile of fissionable materials under United Nations guard, as a proof of our moral unwillingness to use the bombs in a surprise attack against any nation.

INTERPRETING ARMY TIMES Vet-Letter FORECASTING

PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY ARMY TIMES 1419 IRVING STREET N W WASHINGTON 10 D C

By subscription: $12 per year, $7 for six months, or $4 for three months. Not to be reproduced without written permission

VOL. II, NO. 14 APRIL 5, 1947

REPUBLICAN BLUNDER: The attempt by axe-swinging Republicans on the House Appropriations Committee to cut $350 million from the Veterans Administration...necessary to continue paying readjustment...unemployment...allowances to War II vets...was a major GOP blunder.

General Bradley, VA Administrator, was caught flat-footed...since he believed...and rightly...that he had explained fully why the money was needed. And...testimony at closed committee hearings...bears him out.

Bradley's explanation of VA needs...and defense of his position as administrator...was heroic...but might have gone for naught...if Democrats in House of Representatives...had not launched terrific...sarcastic...attack on GOP fund-slashers.

And...as if it was only an April Fool's joke...on April 1...John Taber (R.,N.Y.), chairman of the committee...offered amendment to his own committee report...restoring the $350 million...and voicing his sorrow for the "mistake."

The quick...and positive defeat...of economy axe-swingers...may be good tidings for VA...and for all veterans in general.

Taber's defeat was absolute...so absolute that he knocked himself out...probably will be wary of his future actions trimming veterans' benefits.

Or...on the other hand...if defeat rankles...he may seek other avenues...within or without VA...where cuts can be made.

At committee hearings...Taber defended his position as axe-swinger...and...frankly... was on solid ground...explained that the problems of Congress...to reduce unnecessary governmental expenditures...was "the meaner end"...but when "certain things" are called to attention of Congress..."it is our duty to see that they are corrected to the best of our ability."

And it was obvious...from admissions by VA officials...that some instances have occurred where VA funds were not being spent wisely...where contracts had been negotiated for excessive fees to professional men...dentists...where doctor "consultants" collected large fees for no work.

Taber got "hot" with Bradley...because of latter's convincing...blistering...statement... outlining his duties and responsibilities as VA administrator...placed upon him by laws enacted by Congress.

Bradley told Taber...that if operating costs of VA are reduced to point where services to veterans suffer...we must ask ourselves if this is not false economy...that if the process of readjustment is slowed..."by timid dollar-minded administration of the law"...the eventual cost of delay may far outweigh savings.

Bradley's defense of his position should be required reading for every member of Congress...for every official of a veterans' organization...for all those who feel that veterans' benefits are excessive.

But...unfortunately...few members of Congress...outside of actual members of Appropriations Committee who heard the general...ever will read...or realize...a word of what was said...except Vet-Letter subscribers...on what the problems are...of the magnitude of the task of operating a series of the biggest businesses in the world...hospital...insurance... compensations and pensions...college...training...letter-writing...etc.

Bradley admitted his administration has not been cheap...but said:

"Had I exercised undue caution and timidity in expansion of the Veterans' Administration and thereby delayed its mission, I would have brought down severe criticism not only on myself but on Congress and the entire structure of the Federal government...If I have violated the intent of Congress...in my effort to do this job...then I accept full personal responsibility."

REVIEW SENTENCES: The War and Navy Departments opposed the idea of civilian boards...going into general court martial proceedings...to weigh the problem of whether...or not...a dishonorable discharge given a vet...should be replaced with a better type.

But...Attorney General Clark...the country's highest legal officer...says that is exactly what the civilian boards are authorized to do where they find that error or injustice has occurred.

When Congress passed its Reorganization Act...it banned "private" bills...introduced by individual members of Congress...in behalf of individual vets...to correct military records...and said Army...Navy...and Treasury Department for the Coast Guard...should set up boards of civilian officers to correct these records.

Since...(1)...Many of the private bills previously introduced...were to correct court martial sentences...and...since (2)...Congress...in the GI Bill...had authorized correction of other than general court martial sentences...it was plainly the intention to give the civilian boards authority over general court martial sentences...Clark said.

However...it was emphasized that the boards wouldn't actually be reopening court proceedings in a legal sense...but...rather...would be exercising clemency...or mitigation.

Regardless of what the boards will be doing "legally"...they will be changing discharges adjudged by military courts.

Regulations for the boards now are being drafted...and will be available soon.

MAULDIN VS. THE LEGION: Bill Mauldin, noted War II cartoonist-creator of still-remembered "Joe and Willie" puts a literary microscope over the American Legion in the lead article in the April issue of The Atlantic Magazine.

Bill has some pretty sharp things to say about the Legion...its lobbying technique...its contradictory policies...and its method of operation.

But it makes good reading.

NEW HOUSING PROGRAM: Latest to hook a ride on vet housing band wagon...is Senator Baldwin of Connecticut...freshman Republican...who is ready to sponsor most radical proposal yet advanced in 80th Congress.

With one eye cocked on his political future...he is occasionally mentioned as a possible dark horse candidate for GOP presidential nomination...Baldwin...soon...will propose:

1. A program of combined federal-state housing subsidies...costing upwards of $500,000,000...to underwrite difference between actual housing costs...and what vets can afford to pay.

2. Amendments to National Housing Act...providing 100% federal guarantee on vet home loans...reduction of interest charges of 3¼%...extension of amortization period of loans from 25 to 40 years.

Aim of subsidies bill...is low rentals...and "fair" purchase prices on new homes for sale...to vets only...with emphasis on rents.

Aim of amendments...is to provide opportunity for vets to build...or buy...with no initial outlay of their own cash.

Look for substantial unfavorable reaction...when Baldwin program is introduced...probably next week...not only from building and realty interests...but also States...and housing moderates in Congress...like Senator Taft...who is co-sponsor of famed...and pending...Taft-Ellender-Wagner long-range housing program.

Baldwin program is more radical...more "socialistic," if you will...than T-E-W bill...because it moves both federal and State governments smack into new housing controls over private enterprise...even though private enterprise is being called on to do the job...for profit.

Obviously...if federal and State governments are going to pay direct subsidies to builders...safeguards must be established...to protect taxpayers.

Some sort of governmental policing must be provided...to guard against overcharges...under-the-counter "donations"...other obvious abuses possible...and some sort of State authority must be established...to determine extent of subsidies...through compilation of building cost averages...and actual ability of vets to pay.

At present...only 22...of 48 States...have State housing authorities in existence... organized to cope with program...but few...among 22...have compiled data...sufficient for operation of subsidies program envisaged.

Other defects: by requiring States to match federal subsidy grants...poorer States... where greatest housing problems exist...may not be able to afford costs...nor does bill recognize different financing problems of middle income and low income veterans.

Vets able to pay around $50 rentals...probably would benefit greatly...but question is: will building interests...even with subsidies...be able to provide market for the $20 and $30 monthly rental class...which is in overwhelming majority?

Baldwin program...unlike T-E-W bill...bypasses slum clearance entirely...a fact that many cities...and States...may not like...not on aesthetic grounds merely...but because loss of revenue from slum areas...more and more...is providing a hard-headed business excuse for getting rid of them.

Baldwin program is realistic...providing "bonuses" through subsidies...as incentives to get homes built for rental by private industry...but it also provides specifically that two-thirds of all building...under program...must be for rentals...and builders will scream at that one.

Baldwin program...probably will raise quite a to-do...will help focus congressional attention...now scattered...on urgency of housing problem...may well be the biggest factor in frightening present opposition to T-E-W bill into accepting it...as lesser of two evils.

UNEMPLOYMENT: Vets...particularly younger ones and men disabled...find it progressively tougher to get jobs...despite fact employment is at all-time high...and reconversion of industry is far ahead of schedule...VA reports.

Already...twice as many vets are out of work...as non-vets...with veterans' unemployment jumping 11% in February to boost GI unemployment total into the million class.

Continued weekly claims for jobless compensation...52-20 pay...averaged over 1,100,000 in February...for second consecutive month...while new claims also jumped in December and January...after hitting new low last November.

Total of 56,000 vets exhausted their jobless pay entitlements in January...a new monthly high.

MEDICAL CARE: The future of the greatly-expanded medical care program of the VA...designed to be expanded even further when the approved half billion dollar hospital construction program is completed...still far hence...is in grave danger.

Already there is evidence in Congress...of a feeling that VA medical costs are running too high...presaging a terrific hue and cry...if costs continue to soar...as indications are they will.

Program also in danger because of morale factor among VA hospital staffs...now at their peak in number and quality.

Fact that the improved medical division has the "jitters" as a result of current economy drive in Congress...reported publicly for first time in March 22 issue of Vet-Letter...was confirmed...with a vengeance...this week by General Bradley and Dr. Karl A. Menninger, manager of the new VA hospital at Topeka, Kans.

In a letter to General Bradley...read before the House Appropriations Committee...Dr. Menninger asserted bluntly that "loud headline talk"...on the part of Senators and Representatives...about firing a million government workers...slashing the payrolls...etc...is injuring morale of hospital staffs "to the point of bitterness and sometimes almost to the point of panic."

Dr. Menninger...quoted staff members as saying..."It is the same old VA after all... we were lured into this program on the basis that the government really planned to do something big for the veterans...when jobs were plentiful we were coaxed into this on the implied promise that the government policy was stable and that this program would go ahead...we gave up better opportunities to come here on the assumption that this program would continue and grow...now look."

Menninger wrote...that morale of hospital employes...cannot be injured...without affecting the care of vet-patients...and that fewer man-hours...by employes...in a hospital...inevitably means less treatment for the vets.

PLASTIC SURGERY: The VA now is operating 22 plastic surgery centers...manned by surgeons and others skilled in plastic surgery and provided with special equipment.

Centers are in VA hospitals located at...West Roxbury, Mass...Bronx, N.Y...Washington, D.C...Cleveland, Ohio...Jefferson Barracks, Mo...Fort Logan, Colo...San Francisco, Calif... New Orleans, La...White River Junction, Vt...Aspinwall, Pa...Chamblee, Ga...Hines, Ill... McKinney, Texas...Los Angeles, Calif...and Van Nuys, Calif.

VETS IN COURT: There was hope this week that a plan...originated in U.S. District Court... in the District of Columbia...to set up new procedure for the handling of accused veterans brought to trial...may be extended to all federal courts in the United States...and possibly into State and local courts.

An agreement was reached...at a conference between Chief Justice Bolitha J. Laws...and representatives of the armed forces...the VA...the Justice Department...and bar officials... upon two questionnaires...which would give courts pre-trial information about accused vets.

One...would be filled out by an accused vet...and would give information as to his service connection...and whether or not he was discharged for medical reasons.

The other...would be sent by the court to the VA and the branch of service in which the vet served...and would give the following information to court authorities:

Period of service...whether he was at any time a prisoner of the enemy...whether he was hospitalized or treated during service for combat injuries...non-combat injuries...disease... or abnormal mental condition...whether he was hospitalized after discharge...and if so... when and where.

Plan is designed to save vets...not wholly responsible for their actions...from being treated as criminals...and being treated for whatever emotional instability...which is not legal insanity...ails them.

Plan will be tried out in District of Columbia on experimental basis...and if successful...will be submitted to International Association of Chiefs of Police...and American Bar Association...for consideration.

JOBS IN ALASKA: During next six months...veterans looking for seasonal jobs in Alaska... will never have a better opportunity...says high-placed Interior Department official...in exclusive interview for Vet-Letter.

Joe Flakne...Alaska Branch chief...at Interior...listed literally hundreds of jobs... in Army-Navy construction...highway work...mining...railroad building and maintenance... asserted gold mining...alone...will be limited only by transport facilities available.

Such reassurance is first positive encouragement for vets...from any U.S. official agency concerned with Alaska.

Flakne cautions that conditions are rugged...really rugged...pay scales are equal or less than in States...not higher...but are sufficient to sustain vets...particularly those eager to "case" the territory for possible permanent opportunities there...at no expense to themselves.

Bulk of jobs must be obtained on spot...mostly at Fairbanks and Anchorage...but those interested can obtain a bulletin "Employment in Alaska,"...by writing Vet-Letter...and asking for it.

NATIONAL GUARD: Relaxation of age requirements now permits vets more than 35 years of age to be enlisted in the National Guard.

Men 36 to 38 years of age...may be enlisted if they have had at least one year of service in the U.S. armed forces.

Men 38 to 41 years...may be enlisted if they have had at least two years of service.

Men 41 to 55 years...may be enlisted if they have had at least two years of service... plus the number of years the applicant is over 40 years of age.

For example...a man 42...may be enlisted if he has at least four years service.

Further relaxation also permits vets who have been awarded the Silver Star...or a higher decoration...to be enlisted in the Guard...without regard to age requirements... until his 55th birthday.

SUMMER SERVICE PROJECTS

AMERICAN FRIENDS SERVICE COMMITTEE

THE WAR DEPARTMENT tells us that it is impossible for us to provide for our national defense without military conscription. We must condition the thinking and the acting of our young people so that when danger comes, their response will be pre-determined. They will fly to arms and protect our land. Perhaps they are right; it may be that we cannot secure the number of recruits that are judged to be necessary by the War Department without conscription. But there can certainly be no more obvious confession of the appalling and tragic weakness of our case as a nation if that is true. If volunteers do not sufficiently believe in our country to defend it, then our morale is low and no conscription measure will raise it.

The army of volunteers which is called for by the projects in this statement come forward on an entirely different basis. Their response is based on a desire to serve the social, cultural and spiritual needs of people. Our projects in the United States are designed to create understanding between groups within our country; for those outside this country it is hoped that they will build bridges of understanding and fellowship which will make the world secure—not just our country.

In contrast to the call of the country for military conscription for unwilling defenders, we call for volunteers to whom we offer nothing but a chance to work hard, study vigilantly and try to understand others. For it they receive no compensation, but for the most part, pay their own costs. It is the kind of call that pulls forth people to religious missions abroad and to commitments to other high enterprises. It is building one world; it is building the Kingdom of God; it is the highest patriotism.

PEACE CARAVANS

Caravaners are thoroughly trained by experts in techniques of peace education.

"Since wars begin in the minds of men, it is in the minds of men that the defenses of peace must be constructed." This statement in the Constitution of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization indicates the urgency of and the opportunity for peace education in these days. Students in caravans traveling over an area, or located in one community for seven weeks in the summer can make a significant contribution to this work. Using all types of educational methods, such as radio, films, drama, discussion and study groups, they seek to arouse interest and concern in the problems of securing a peaceful world, and to help community groups and individuals to find ways to turn their concern into effective action.

A Training Institute for all caravaners working east of the Rockies will be held in Ohio or Indiana, from June 20 to 28. For caravans working on the west coast, a training institute will be held in connection with the Institute of International Relations at Whittier College, Whittier, Calif., June 29 to July 7.

Caravans, composed of from three to five men and women, will work in communities in the following areas: New England, Middle Atlantic, North Central, Middle West and West Coast. One or two caravans will, for the fourth year, visit summer camps in Michigan.

DATES: For Caravans east of the Rockies: June 20 to August 15. For caravans on the west coast: June 29 to August 20.

FEE: $90. Some scholarship aid is available.

Radio is one medium used by caravaners to stimulate interest in peace.

WORK CAMPS

The American Friends Service Committee sponsors work camps in areas of social tension and economic need in the United States. This summer young people who participate in the camps will work together with the residents of nine different communities in building playgrounds, recreation centers and school buildings; in repairing homes and various community facilities; and in initiating health and recreational programs. In addition, campers have a chance to gain insight into some of America's most pressing problems by living and working with people in areas where these problems are prevalent, and by discussing community affairs with local leaders. Frequent exploratory field trips and recreational activities are planned by the campers, and daily group meditation helps them to relate their new experiences to their lives.

Amateur masons build understanding and friendship as well as walls.

The work camps are co-educational, and like all the projects of the AFSC, interracial. Campers participate in the operation of the camps by sharing in the planning and direction of the work, and by performing the household tasks together.

The camp fee is $100. Anyone who would like to attend a work camp, but cannot afford to pay the fee, is urged to apply for scholarship aid. A deposit fee of $5 must be made when an applicant is accepted. This fee is part of the total camp fee and will be refunded if the applicant withdraws not later than one week before the opening of camp.

The camps open June 27 and close August 22.

Building Cooperation

For two summers, work campers at Stonington, Maine, have worked with the Health Committee in this geographically and culturally isolated sea coast village. They have attempted to draw together the various factions of the town by encouraging them to participate in a recreation program for young people. Last summer a building was repaired in which the young people could carry on social, community and recreation activities. This summer campers will make permanent improvements on the recreation building and will help to establish a pattern of community responsibility designed to insure continuing recreational activities for the young people.

Aiding Education

In the Clinch Mountain Community, Grainger County, Tennessee, 52 children attend school in a 20′ x 30′ one-room schoolhouse. The entire county has $1800 per year to spend on repairs for their 48 school buildings. The work campers will help the Clinch Mountain Community to build a two-room schoolhouse with a kitchen for a hot lunch program and an adequate playground.

Helping 'Neglected Area' Residents

Most of the people of Ottumwa, Iowa, make their living by working in the railroad business or the meat packing industry. Great gaps in social and economic conditions exist between workers and employers. Recently 500 people living in Central Addition, one of the neglected sections of the city, formed the Island Council to press for civic improvements and community recreational facilities. Work campers will help the community build a play area and a center for community meetings and winter recreation.

SIZE: 12 men and women

Youth Rehabilitation

In Phoebus, Virginia, work campers will remodel an old store building to be used as a recreation center for the young people in the Negro community, which forms about half the population of the town. Campers will also work on a nearby playfield and support the efforts of local leaders in carrying out a much-needed recreational program in this community. Campers will live on the campus of Hampton Institute.

(Co-sponsored with the Fellowship of Southern Churchmen)

SIZE: 8 men and women

Everyone pitches in to help clean up this vacant lot.

Self-Help Home Improvement

Work campers will continue the same type of work done by two previous summer work camps and winter week end work camps in Chicago, Illinois. This consists of helping low income families in the interracial area of Near Northside Chicago paint, plaster, paper and improve their homes. Campers will also participate in the work of various social service agencies operating in the community.

(Midwest Branch, AFSC, 189 West Madison St., Chicago 2, Illinois)

SIZE: 15 men and women

Neighborhood Organization

Last summer, campers, working through the Detroit, Michigan, Council of Social Agencies, organized community activities in several Western District communities around "tot lots." These were vacant lots which were turned into playgrounds for children. Older children and parents built the playground equipment; parents furnished some funds and supervised playground activities. Outdoor movies were held in the "tot lots" in the evenings. The same approach to neighborhood organization will be followed again this year.

SIZE: 12 men and women

This building will make possible a hot lunch program for a rural school.

Health Education

Spanish-speaking Americans, comprising one-third of the population of San Antonio, Texas, live in a section of the city with few sanitation facilities, few paved streets, completely inadequate housing and an extremely high infant mortality rate, due mainly to diarrhea. Work campers will join other community agencies in trying to combat diarrhea in the area by screening houses, privies, teaching mothers sanitary ways of preparing food for their babies and collecting data for a sewage disposal program. Campers may also help build workshops to house a native crafts program, which is being started by the Mexican Christian Institute. This work camp offers Spanish students an unusual opportunity to be of service in a community where the majority of the population speaks only Spanish.

SIZE: 10 men and women

Building Security

In southeast Missouri, at Lilbourn, 450 evicted sharecroppers are living in nine former Farm Security Administration housing projects called the Delmo Group Labor Homes. A non-profit organization, Delmo Housing Corporation, has taken over the housing projects and is making home ownership possible for the former tenants. Work campers will help one or two of these projects to convert FSA office space into community rooms, where the residents can gather socially and work out their common problems. A similar project was carried on last summer.

SIZE: 12 men and women

Community Integration

Work campers will assist a Presbyterian mission in enlarging its recreational facilities for 4000 Spanish-Americans in San Gabriel, California. At the same time, campers will study the problem of integrating the Spanish-Americans with the rest of the community and will train local leaders to carry on winter recreational programs. Campers with some knowledge of Spanish would be exceptionally helpful in this project.

SIZE: 15 men and women

DATES: June 30 to August 23

Campers supervise children's play in city "tot lot."

INTERNESHIPS

Interne projects combine actual work in a given field with discussions of its problems by experts with study, field trips, supplementary reading and talks by educational and religious leaders. The projects are designed for those who wish to gain some pre-professional experience or wish to acquire a well-rounded picture of a particular social or economic situation. Such a work and study technique enables young people to discover for themselves a moral and religious basis for their opinions on important issues.

Two types of Interne projects will be offered this summer: Interne-In-Industry and Interne-In-Cooperatives.

Interne-In-Industry, Philadelphia: In the Interne-in-Industry project students will secure their own job in an industry at prevailing wages. Members will live together cooperatively while working and studying and will contribute $11 weekly for living expenses. This is a year-round project, but a special summer unit will begin June 27 and end September 5.

SIZE: 20 men and women

Interne-In-Cooperatives, Minneapolis, Minnesota and New York City: Students who participate in this project will have an opportunity to work in several phases of a cooperative program; that is, in wholesale, retail, producer and educational work. Lectures and study help to give an all-round picture of the cooperative movement in the United States.

The salaries of the entire group will be pooled to pay living expenses; therefore, each unit member will have an opportunity to do some volunteer educational and promotional work for the cooperatives. Internes will live in a Negro settlement house in Minneapolis, where a similar project was held last summer.

SIZE: 12 men and women for each unit

Students from all over the world have outdoor class in international relations.

INTERNATIONAL SERVICE SEMINARS

The most important task of our day is building a peaceful world. To obtain such a world, the people of all countries must realize the need for peace, must have attitudes on which peace can be built and must have enough information about world situations and their implications to know how to solve particular problems.

International Service Seminars bring together representatives of many different nations and cultures who are studying in the United States for seven weeks of cooperative living and studying. Students have an opportunity to explore together with a faculty of experts the possibilities of building a peaceful world, and together they can seek the spiritual, intellectual and moral resources necessary for the creation of such a world.

It is expected that one seminar will be held in each of the following areas: New England, Middle Atlantic, Middle West, South West and the West Coast. The dates will be announced later.

FEE: For seven weeks, $100, including room and board, but not transportation. Anyone interested should not hesitate to apply because of the expense involved. Some scholarship aid is available.

INSTITUTIONAL SERVICE UNITS

Institutional Service Units were started by the AFSC after the Committee became aware of the need for personnel in our state institutions. That need is still great. However, the value of ISU has expanded to cover public education in supporting progressive administrators and study of social conditions promoting maladjustments as well as prevention.

Through ISU, young people serve as attendants, assistant recreational and occupational therapists, cottage supervisors, office workers and in other positions in mental hospitals or reformatories. They receive the prevailing wage for their work and live in the homes furnished for employees by the institution.

Although experience and training in a specific field is an asset, it is not required. Jobs will be rotated in order to give the unit members varied experience.

Members of the staffs of the institutions give about 30 hours of lectures, or its equivalent, to the unit members on the care of the mentally ill or on reformatory methods. In addition, speakers from various professions and backgrounds visit and speak to the unit.

CONTRIBUTION: Unit members contribute $10 to $18 to the budget of the ISU, depending on their length of service. This amount is payable in monthly installments.

DATES: Although applicants may join at any time, the large summer units open approximately June 15. Members may join the mental hospital units for a period of not less than two months and may join the reformatory units for a period of not less than three months.

SIZE: In mental hospitals, 10-30 men and women.

In women's reformatory, 10 women.

In boys' reformatory, 8 men.

Mental Hospitals

Rockland State Hospital, Orangeburg, N. Y.: Following a summer and a winter unit, another unit will be held at Rockland State Hospital, which has 6000 mental patients. The hospital needs attendants, assistants in occupational and recreational therapy, nurses, laboratory assistants and clerical workers. The salary is $95 per month plus maintenance, and unit members work 8 hours per day.

New Jersey State Hospital, Trenton: Units have been held at the New Jersey State Hospital for the past year. This hospital has 4200 mental patients and needs attendants, assistants in recreational therapy, nurses, laboratory assistants and clerical workers. Unit members are on duty for 12 hours each day with one and one-half hours off for meals and two hours off for rest during the day. The salary is $100 per month.

A Mental Hospital, Pennsylvania: A unit similar to the above will be held in a mental hospital in Pennsylvania this summer.

Reformatories

New Jersey State Reformatory for Women, Clinton Farms: This reformatory has 500 residents from 16 years of age up, and there are 30 to 60 babies under two years of age in the nursery. The reformatory needs assistant cottage matrons, teachers, clerical workers, dietitians, nurses and nursery workers. The salary is $70 per month plus maintenance. Unit members work 12 hours per day, with one and one-half hours off for meals and two hours off for rest during the day. Units have been held at Clinton Farms for the past year.

A Boys' Reformatory, New Jersey: A similar unit will be opened in a boys' reformatory, probably in New Jersey, this summer.

MEXICAN SERVICE PROJECTS

Young men and women have been working with the people of Mexico on a variety of health, recreational and community projects since 1939. Four projects are offered this summer. Students who share in this work have an opportunity to help directly where help is needed and to build understanding between the people of Mexico and the people of the United States. A special pamphlet entitled "A Friendly Service in Mexico" is available to those who wish a detailed account of this program.

Short-term Summer Projects

Toluca, Mexico: A group of women are invited back to Toluca, where a project was undertaken last year, to carry on a variety of service projects under the direction of the Departments of Public Health and Education. Work will include helping in the clinic and hospital, visiting homes with the nurses, teaching language and leading recreation.

Mexican child receives inoculation by AFSC worker in a village street.

Taxhay, Hidalgo: A small number of men will return to this remote Indian village to continue helping the teacher to improve the school facilities, and to share in the village life. Last summer the unit members helped the villagers to enlarge the school playground.

Year-Round Projects

Tetelcingo, Morelos: Members of this unit are working primarily in the clinic, under the Department of Public Health. They also help with other community activities in education and recreation. Several women can be added to this group for the summer weeks.

Yautepec, Morelos: The boys and men in Yautepec are working on projects in public health engineering. They also help provide recreation leadership and assist in the Department of Education program of teaching illiterates to read and write. Several young men may join this group during the summer.

DATES: For the short-term summer projects, about June 25-August 20.

FEE: For the short-term projects, $125. For those who stay in the work for three months or longer the fee is $45 per month.

Quaker International Voluntary Service

The AFSC plans to sponsor international work camps in Finland, Italy, and perhaps other countries this summer. These service units will be organized on the same plan as the AFSC work camps in this country. Young people from America and Europe will work on the repair and rebuilding of homes and community facilities.

About 50 volunteers from the United States will be accepted for this service. Preference will be given to those with previous experience in AFSC projects and with language skills. Estimated cost, including transportation and maintenance, is $600. Some scholarship aid is available.

INSTITUTES OF INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

Enduring peace must be a grass-roots movement, arising out of the life and thought and determination of ordinary citizens. With this realization, the American Friends Service Committee sponsors Institutes of International Relations each summer directed toward informing the American people about the problems of peace and the causes of war and stimulating discussion and action on these issues.

Twelve Institutes will be held this summer featuring recognized authorities on international questions, leaders in domestic affairs, educators and religious leaders as faculty members. These Institutes are designed primarily for community leaders—teachers, ministers and club and labor leaders. College and university students are particularly welcomed.

Complete programs for each Institute will be available in May.

JUNIOR SERVICE PROJECTS

Projects for students 15 years of age or through the second year of high school are planned in work camps, Institutes of International Relations and Mexican Service projects, similar to those described in this pamphlet. If you are interested, send for the separate folder listing these projects.

COLLEGE CREDIT

During the 12 years that the AFSC has sponsored work and study projects for young people, many colleges have given college credit in economics, sociology, religion, psychology and political science for this work. College students should consult their deans or major professors about this possibility.

20 SOUTH TWELFTH STREET PHILADELPHIA 7, PENNSYLVANIA

The American Friends Service Committee for many years has been experimenting with techniques which will enable young people to know and understand fully the world about them. With a philosophy based on respect for the personality of the individual and belief in the power of love to overcome prejudice and suspicion, the AFSC goes into areas of social or economic tension all over the world with material aid and a sense of human fellowship in an effort to promote peace. The Committee attempts to bring into focus the real causes of distress, and through experiments based on love of service for one's fellow man, to point ways which will erase the causes of misery and hatred.

Although the Committee's work is small in the face of the world's great need, it is a symbol of the desire of thousands of people to help those who suffer.

WHAT IS A WORK CAMP?

The summer work camps of the American Friends Service Committee aim to serve a needy community in a practical way; to give young people a chance to learn first hand some of the basic causes of racial or religious intolerance, economic or social insecurity; and to give the students themselves a chance for growth, for learning new attitudes by living and working with people of different races and from various social and economic backgrounds.

The work camp itself is composed of a group of boys and girls between the ages of 15 to 18, who with a staff of four or five people, spend eight weeks working together with the residents of a community carrying out a practical program for the use of the community.

Campers perform the household tasks of the camp cooperatively, take field trips to places of interest nearby, take part in various recreational activities, discuss with local leaders the special problems of the community, and worship together.

The building of community facilities is not the only task of a work camp—another important task is to rebuild attitudes. If you live in a situation, you understand it better. If you work with a person, you begin to judge him by his skills, his cooperativeness, his abilities. Intolerance finds no place in a group whose main purpose it is to build a house, a church or a playground for children. And in that building of playground or church, understanding and good will are constructed; the very foundations of peace are laid.

WHAT IS AN INSTITUTE?

For those high school students who can have fun with other teen-agers from different cities and towns discussing social, political, economic and spiritual problems of our world, the American Friends Service Committee sponsors each summer high school Institutes of International Relations across the country.

Sons and daughters of miner and astronomer, doctor and pullman porter seek answers to questions raised by world problems. They live, play and think together during the time they discuss topics like: "Who's Kidding Whom?" in international affairs, "One Family: Approaches to Intergroup Understanding," or "The Offense of the Spirit."

Well-known authorities on international affairs and human relations are available to the delegates as consultants or resource people. Resource leaders listen to questions raised by the delegates and to the solutions they propose, then informally discuss approaches and answers.

Although faculty members help answer questions and guide the thinking of the young people, delegates in many of the Institutes develop their own solutions to these problems through discussion groups set up and led by fellow students. In some of the Institutes the familiar pattern of lecture and forum with adult-led round table discussions is followed. Some Institutes experiment in democratic living as well as talk about it. Delegates regulate their own living conditions, plan their recreation, and administer camp chores. In all instances, a staff of college-age young people and adults help in carrying out the program and sharing in discussions of policy.

FOREWORD

Did you ever hear of a sharecropper? Do you know anything of the life of a migrant laborer? Do you have racial or religious prejudice in your town, or haven't you noticed any?

And what do you think about Russia? Do you think the United Nations will be able to maintain peace? What should the United States do about the homeless, starving people of Europe and Asia?

Are your opinions of these issues based on facts, or on things you "just heard"?

The American Friends Service Committee, through its summer voluntary service projects, offers you an opportunity to explore some of these problems.

WORK CAMPS are located in areas of social or economic need in the United States, and give you a chance to do some useful work as well as to learn the basic causes of some of our social problems.

INSTITUTES OF INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS provide ten days' discussion of international and domestic affairs with well-known authorities as faculty members.

MEXICAN SERVICE SEMINARS combine recreational, educational and health services with study of Mexican culture, problems and the Spanish language.

In all these projects, students are given the experience of living, working and studying together with people of all races, religions and nationality backgrounds. Participation in group worship and meditation is an important part of every AFSC project.

VOLUNTEER SUMMER PROJECTS

For HIGH SCHOOL STUDENTS

WORK CAMPS

Four work camps are planned for high school students this summer. Descriptions of these projects follow.

BUILD A SUMMER CAMP

For the second year campers will work with the Dixwell Community Center, NEW HAVEN, CONNECTICUT, in developing adequate summer camp facilities for Negro children at Camp Holly Ridge, 10 miles east of New Haven on Long Island Sound. This year campers will build a library and a laundry, and will help with the camp recreation and activities program.

SIZE: Eight boys, eight girls and staff.

BUILD A COMMUNITY CHURCH

In PAOLI, PENNSYLVANIA, 12 Negro families, through the Golden Thread Club, have bought their homes cooperatively and are now remodeling their

General Information About Work Camps

WHO SHOULD APPLY: High school boys and girls between the ages of 15 and 18 of any race, nationality or religious background.

HEALTH: Each student must be inoculated against typhoid fever before arriving at camp. A nurse or other medical personnel and facilities will be available in each camp.

LEADERSHIP: The camp staff will include: (1) a married couple directing each camp; (2) a boys' and a girls' counsellor; (3) a trained dietitian in charge of meals. All members of the staff are carefully selected for their training and abilities in working with young people.

COST: $125.00.

DEPOSIT FEE: A deposit fee of $5.00 must be made when the applicant is accepted. This fee is part of the total camp fee. It will be refunded if the applicant withdraws his application not later than one week before the opening of camp.

SCHOLARSHIPS: A limited number of camp fee scholarships are available for qualified students otherwise unable to attend.

DATES: June 27 - August 22.

SUPPLEMENTARY ANNOUNCEMENTS for each camp giving more detail about leadership, housing and projects will be available later.

FILM SLIDES AND MOVIES, in color and black and white, with explanatory narratives, are available on request.

INSTITUTES of INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

Eight Institutes of International Relations are planned for high school students this summer. These Institutes bring well-known authorities on world affairs and human relations to discuss with students international and domestic problems for approximately ten days.

Schedules and programs vary with specific Institutes. In some cases the youth Institute is held in conjunction with an adult Institute, with faculty members being shared with the high school students. In other areas, the high school Institute is completely separate, held at a camp or on a college campus. The program, in general, is as follows:

After beginning the day with a worship service, there are lectures and discussion in the morning; the afternoon is free for recreation; the evening is given over partly to serious discussion and partly to games, folk-dancing or singing. Depending on the Institute they attend, delegates may swim, climb mountain trails or ride horseback.

Institutes for high school students will be held this year at:

BUILD A COMMUNITY CHURCH

In PAOLI, PENNSYLVANIA, 12 Negro families, through the Golden Thread Club, have bought their homes cooperatively and are now remodeling their homes and trying to build up their community through cooperative efforts. Work campers will help the residents to build a community church, and to remodel some houses.

Held in cooperation with the Evangelical and Reformed Church.

SIZE: Ten boys, ten girls and staff.

BUILD MORE BEAUTIFUL HOMES

Campers will work in the southside area of MEDIA, PENNSYLVANIA helping the South Media Playground Association in a block improvement program among Negro families. Campers will help the residents plant flowers, clean yards, paint, plaster and paper their homes, do necessary repairs and generally improve the surroundings. They will also help to paint and repair the Media Fellowship House.

SIZE: Ten boys, ten girls and staff.

BUILD A BRIDGE

Campers in SHANNON COUNTY, MISSOURI, on the edge of the Ozarks, will help build two concrete fords, or low water bridges, to make transportation in and out of the community possible even in bad weather. Campers will also help to improve approximately three miles of road in the county, help build a community center, and improve the water supply for a nearby school.

Held in cooperation with the University of Chicago Laboratory High School.

SIZE: Eight boys, eight girls and staff.

MEXICAN SERVICE SEMINARS

Since 1939 men and women have worked with the American Friends Service Committee in Mexico in service projects designed to increase good will and understanding. Their work has centered around public health and education. They have helped to build model homes, school houses, a cotton gin; have assisted doctors and nurses in clinics, and have organized recreation programs for children. Groups are now at work in the states of Morelos and Hidalgo with opportunities open to both men and women.

During the summer of 1947 there will be projects for boys of high school age and projects for men and women of college age or older. Projects will open about June 25 and close around August 20. The cost (not including transportation) is $125.

A detailed pamphlet, "A Friendly Service in Mexico," is available on request.

For further information about any of these projects, or other projects of the AFSC, write:

The American Friends Service Committee represents the Religious Society of Friends (Quakers) in national and international fields of social action. The Committee was founded in 1917 to carry on relief and post-war reconstruction in Europe. It has since been engaged in many projects here and abroad to promote international, industrial and interracial understanding, and to offer opportunities for constructive service, participated in and supported by Americans of all faiths.

At the present time the Committee is engaged in relief and rehabilitation work in eight European countries as well as in China, India and Japan. Besides its many educational projects for young people, the Committee's program also includes a self-help cooperative housing project in western Pennsylvania, work in economic relations and race relations, work with prisoners and peace education. All of these projects are carried on without regard to race, creed or color.

All of the Committee's work is rooted in two fundamental Quaker principles: respect for the personality of the individual and confidence in the creative power of love to remove prejudice and suspicion, and thus take away the need for strife and misery.

Dear Miss Oldt:

I am embarrassed to have to answer your letter of January 29 in almost the exact way that I answered a similar one four or five months ago. We still don't have enough money to do the things I want to do, one of which is definitely to be a repository for an Antioch student much of the time.

When my ship comes in, I will write you for help. Meanwhile, it is far from harbor--a good many thousands of dollars away for the 1948 budget.

I am sorry that on this account I can't plan to use Miss Engel.

PERSONNEL DEPARTMENT

January 29, 1948

Dr. George S. Mitchell, Director
Southern Regional Council
63 Auburn Avenue, N. E.
Atlanta, Georgia

Dear Dr. Mitchell:

When we last discussed the possibility of your using Antioch cooperative students in your office, you thought it might be possible for you to continue the program in 1948. I am, therefore, writing to inquire about such a possibility for one of our social science students who wants to take a job at the end of March, which is the beginning of our next work period.

Miss Rosa Engel is a senior student who has been majoring in sociology and most recently has been working with Professor Stevens on a book dealing with civil liberties in the South. She has done considerable research on this subject and spent ten days during her last work period at Highlander Folk School, attempting to determine some of the conditions about which she was concerned. She is now autonomously carrying several courses which are directly related to this topic, in order that she will be able to complete a good share of the writing of several chapters.

The kind of projects which you discussed with Mr. Dawson last spring, including social and economic studies pertaining to conditions in the South as related to housing, health, farm ownership, vocational education, and the like, would be of real interest to Miss Engel. She could be of real value in assisting in the research necessary in dealing with these problems and would greatly appreciate an opportunity to work with your Council. At the present time, Miss Engel's interest is in the freedom of the press and of speech as it exists today in the South and the various forces of reaction and of progress that are evident.

It is hoped that you will be in a position to consider an Antioch student and that a mutually satisfactory arrangement can be made to begin on March twenty-ninth. We will look forward to hearing from you with regard to this matter. If there is any further information which you would find helpful in making a decision, please do not hesitate to request it.

Thank you for your interest and cooperation,

Sincerely yours,

Esther Oldt

March 5, 1948

Dear Listener:

I should like to tell you about a contest - a contest that should be of intense interest to you as an individual and as one who is vitally concerned with the progress of democratic thinking.

Starting March 21, Drew Pearson, news commentator and analyst over ABC, will launch a contest on: "How To Make Democracy Live." Entries will take the form of letters to Mr Pearson giving everyone an opportunity to express his opinions freely on the subject.

A distinguished Board of Judges will include The Honorable James F Byrnes, former Associate Justice of the Supreme Court and former Secretary of State; The Honorable Tom Clark, Attorney General of the United States; and The Honorable Clare Boothe Luce, noted author and former member of the House of Representatives.

Such a contest will provide an important service to all Americans by helping to make us think about our American heritage. The number of entries to the contest will not be the only effect of the undertaking because many hundreds of thousands of men, women and children who do not submit entries will, nevertheless, be aroused to thinking about the problems involved.

I have therefore taken the liberty of enclosing two posters concerning the contest. I would greatly appreciate your cooperation in having them placed in prominent places.

The contest will be announced on the air during Drew Pearson's broadcast of Sunday evening, March 21, over your local ABC station. We hope you will be listening. In fact, we hope you will consider writing your own views on: "How To Make Democracy Live."

Dear Mr. Corbett:

Thank you for your letter of June 14 about the talk I am to make at Berea July 13 at 1:30 Pm.

You need not allow me forty-five minutes. I can always say whatever I have in twenty-five or, at most, thirty minutes.

I am collecting material and will try to do you a conscientious job of interpreting what I understand to be labor's policies.

My last meeting with the Country Life Association was in Lexington, Kentucky, in about 1938 and I greatly enjoyed it.

Sincerely,

George S. Mitchell

Dear Dr. Mitchell:

It is mighty fine of you to accept the important and difficult spot on the program of the American Country Life Association. Just to verify the wire, the main topic for the afternoon session July 13th is "Labor Policy and Rural America". At 1:30 your topic "What are Labor's Policies and How do They Affect Farm People" is scheduled. Will 45 minutes be sufficient? We have been attempting to get a labor leader to also speak on this spot but to date have not been successful. I think we shall give up on this and ask you to carry the burden alone.

Sorry you cannot be with us longer. Would appreciate your remaining throughout the three days and taking part in all of the discussions.

We do appreciate your acceptance and the contribution that you will make to the meeting.

Sincerely yours,

Dear Mr. Atwood:

At my request you very kindly supplied me with the name of Mr. L. A. Potts as suitable to be considered for the job at St. Helena Island. I sent Mr. Potts' name on it. Today I had word from Mr. Marion A. Wright of the Penn School Board that the State of South Carolina, in taking over the School buildings, has required that no other educational program be conducted on the Island for one year.

This, therefore, postpones filling the place in comp munity education.

Mr. Wright tells me that Mr. Potts' name will be kept for possible use at such time as the School is in a position to go forward with its program.

I am most grateful for your ready help in sending me Mr. Potts' name.

Dear Mr. Mitchell:

For the position as Head of Penn School in South Carolina, I can think of no one better suited than Mr. L. A. Potts, Director of Agriculture, Tuskegee Institute, Alabama.

Mr. Potts is a graduate of Hampton Institute, Iowa State College, and Cornell University. He did an excellent job as Director of Agriculture at Prairie View, and is doing a good job now at Tuskegee.

Mr. Potts has initiative and his mind is filled with ideas. I am definitely of the impression that he would be an excellent selection for this place.

Dear Mr. Allen:

We are happy to acknowledge your check for $1.00 and to add your name to the list of NEW SOUTH subscribers.

The mimeographed tables which you requested are enclosed. The figures used as a basis for statistical comparison in the April NEW SOUTH were drawn from reports of the U. S. Bureau of the Census. In computing median values, the figures were weighted in proportion to the amount of rural, rural non-farm, and urban housing found in the respective States.

I am sorry to say that this is all the information on Southern housing which we have available at present.

Also enclosed is an errata slip for "Housing in the South," a copy of the May NEW SOUTH, and a leaflet describing the origin and functions of the Southern Regional Council. Should you care to become a member of the Council, we would be happy to enroll you at the cost of an additional dollar.

If I can be of further help, please let me know.

Dear Miss Adams:

I am sorry to be so long in writing, but Dr. Mitchell has been out of town and yesterday was my first opportunity to talk with him. I'm afraid there is nothing spectacular about the following suggestions, but they are all we have to offer:

(1) In event you have not queried all the following colleges, Dr. Mitchell suggests that you do so: Winthrop College, Rock Hill; Converse College, Spartanburg; Agnes Scott, Atlanta; Sweetbriar College, Amherst, Va. Dr. Mitchell also points out a fact -- of which you are no doubt aware -- that the University of South Carolina is reportedly expanding its sociology department.

(2) Outside the academic sphere, you might find that the Southern Association of Science and Industry has a congenial position open. The Association has an office in Charleston, where it publishes a magazine called DIXIE.

(3) You might want to look into the research organization of the Democratic National Committee, under the directorship of William Batt, Jr., in Washington.

(4) I might remind you of the two possibilities I mentioned in our talk: the National Planning Association (Washington, D.C.), which administers the Committee for the South project, and the Bureau of Agricultural Economics.

I enjoyed our talk in Columbia and sincerely hope you will find the sort of position you deserve. When you are in Atlanta, be sure to drop in on us at the Council.

Dear Mr. Fleming:

I would, first of all, like to record a change in my mailing address for the "New South" and other publications of the Council from Lambuth College in Jackson, Tenn. to 727 Queen St., Columbia, S. C.

Secondly, I am writing to inquire if the Council has contacts with persons or knows of any positions open in the field of Social Science with special emphasis on the regional development of the South.

I have a B.S. degree in Business Administration from the University of South Carolina and an M.S. from Ohio University (1946) in personnel work and social science. For the past two years I have been employed at Lambuth College in Jackson, Tennessee, teaching in the field of economics with emphasis on the social and economic trends in the U.S. and one course on the Regional Development of the South. I have combined the teaching with some personnel and administrative work.

I plan to make a change in jobs this summer, and am most interested in continuing work along the line of socio-economic development of the U.S., particularly of the South. Teaching is my first interest although I can, and have done office work. This summer I am attending a work shop in Human Resources of the South at the University of North Carolina. I find this work most interesting and should like to continue similar work in my regular position.

If you do know of any possible job areas or people whom I might contact, I should appreciate very much your letting me know so that I might furnish these people with further information about myself while making inquiry.

Here is the manuscript which I prepared for the Berea meeting.

Here also is a summary of what I did say. Your judgment would be better than mine on which to run. I take your judgment.

I very much enjoyed coming to the meeting and am only sorry that, because I had long ago promised to be at Nashville, could not stay for the whole of the meeting.

I daresay my remarks caused a little strain here or there, but it seemed to me that we had all been over-serious all morning and that I could at any rate introduce the winds of controversy.

Remarks by George S. Mitchell at Meeting of the American Country Life Association, Berea, Kentucky, July 13, 1948

Mr. George S. Mitchell, Executive Director of the Southern Regional Council of Atlanta, analyzed in terms of sub-regional development the main industrial, agricultural and political problems of the Southeastern states. He described the broad differences in patterns of settlement of the four main sub-regions; namely, the Mountain area, the Piedmont, the plantation belt and the piney woods coastal strip.

For the mountain area he prescribed reorganization of agricultural land use, further forest care, stepped-up industrial activity and increased tourist and recreational development.

The Piedmont area he considered to be neatly balanced between industry and a democratic family-farm pattern. For its remaining problems he urged greater adaptation of its agriculture to sales outlets in its own factory towns and continuance of the democratic tendencies already well advanced in its trade unions and in its broad use of the franchise.

The problems of the coastal strip were described mainly in terms of the active conservation of the timber resources and wider distribution of earnings, probably through trade unions or cooperatives, or both.

For the plantation belt he recommended further industrial opportunity, vocational education, and the modification of the plantation pattern by public and private measures which would establish a substantial family farm economy within most of the plantation counties.

Turning then to the political life of the states in the Southeastern area, he pointed to a predominant political influence within most of the states by the plantation area, and pointed out that repeatedly, in the states of the lower South, progressive measures acceptable to people in the Piedmont counties were ruled out as being unacceptable to the plantation counties, whose landlord-tenant relationship, he thought, was the main factor in causing them to withhold assent.

He concluded that the public life of the states of the lower South would reach a new plane of constructiveness when organized industrial workers and organized family farmers could freely join in support of measures beneficial to both.

George S. Mitchell
63 Auburn Avenue
Atlanta 3, Georgia

WHAT ARE LABOR'S POLICIES AND HOW DO THEY AFFECT FARM PEOPLE?

The organized labor movement in this country today embraces some sixteen million workers. At least two-thirds of this growth has occurred since the bottom of the last depression, when industrial workers began to organize on a large scale. The structure of the movement is confused and competative. Policy for labor is a mixture of long-run considerations with responses to day-to-day pressures, and the latter are perhaps generally the strongest. No central organ of the movement as a whole exists, and therefore students, statesmen, and businessmen seeking labor's policies must all turn to individual labor leaders, voicing for the time-being the policies of their own organizations. Still, within this uncertainty some generalizations hold. I list a few:

High wages
The short work-week
Agreeable and safe working conditions
Security on the job
Steady earnings
Democratic procedures in factory management
Political democracy

Certain of these policies, notably the first two, are often held by farmers to be hurtful to them. The familiar argument is that city labor, by demanding high pay and short hours, runs up the prices of city-made things, and farmers suffer.

The argument has some truth, of course. It has most truth in occupations least modified by modern mass-production methods. It is in these occupations that labor cost is large. This applies particularly to the building trades. But the range of such high-labor-cost occupations is constantly narrowing. In the industries which make most of the things farmers use the rule is mass-production under conditions of heavy capital investment. Direct labor cost in these modern industries seldom exceeds twenty of twenty-five per cent. The rest is cost of materials, management overhead, interest, sales cost, and profits. It is true that high wages figure as an element of cost in the materials purchased by factories, but again they are seldom predominant. Industry sets prices at what it can get, in open competition or by the help of semi-monopoly conditions. In a sellers' market such as we have today industry is not visibly pricing its goods at levels which will merely cover costs; it asks, and gets, about what it can. Thus, the CIO printed figures the other week to show that in the first two rounds of post-war wage increases the straight-time hourly earnings rose 29%. During the same period the companies granting this wage increase upped their prices 61%, and their profits increased 116% (Union News Service, July 5, 1948).

Some account must also be taken of the steady increase in productivity per worker, under conditions of high investment and careful management. That this is important is strikingly proved in the recent UAW-General Motors agreement to add to wages each year a modest increment for this growth in productivity.

The conclusion pointed to is that the price of manufactured goods, while influenced by labor costs, is influenced mainly by what the traffic will bear, and includes in recent years a bonanza of corporate profit.

The other things for which labor unions work are quite minor in their effects on costs; few will quarrel if from higher prices some small part covers cleanliness and safety in factory and mining conditions, stability of employment even to the point of the guaranteed annual wage, and a work week no longer than is compatible with health and reasonable leisure in a machine economy.

The public, including farmers, undoubtedly feel aggrieved by labor's ultimate means of getting its gains, namely, the strike. Labor has no pleasure in using this weapon. Union members are as able as anyone else to make the calculation that it will take many months of higher wages to cover the loss of wages while out on strike. Labor uses the strike because during many decades it has learned that employers able to pay more will withhold wage increases unless forced by the threat of the strike, or by the strike itself, to divide income with the workers. In passing it should be said, also, that many strikes in recent years have occurred because, notwithstanding the legal recognition of collective bargaining, many employers have doggedly used every tactic of delay and obstruction to avoid recognising and dealing with the union, until their workpeople in exasperation have resorted to the cut-through device of the strike. We would have much more labor peace if employers stood ready to bargain honestly, and in time we would gain a soberer and more responsible union leadership were bargaining on such terms to become generally accepted.

Parenthetically, it should be said that the labor movement in this country has generally, during and since the war, vigorously supported price control. It has been willing to hold its wage demands to a price level controlled centrally. When Congress threw price control away, listening to the argument of the National Association of Manufacturers that free prices would bring high production and therefore reasonable prices soon, labor had no choice but to pursue a rising price level with demands for wage increases. In a period of continuing inflationary pressures the decision to decontrol prices was in labor's opinion unwise. The Nation, through its Congress, had a public responsibility in this matter of post-war prices, and the Congress ducked.

Labor has long argued that a generally high wage level means greater prosperity for farmers. The five million farmers sell most of their products to the thirty-eight million industrial workers. This argument has at last achieved responsible recognition. The proposals made to the Congress by the Department of Agriculture last year for a long-range agricultural policy were largely built on the doctrine that farm income depends on the rate of city consumption. Mr. Secretary Anderson said, "It is clear that people are willing to buy, when they have the money, more agricultural goods than they have ever bought." He then proceeded to recommend to the Congress that our future plans for farm production be based upon assumptions as to non-farm income. Thus the fundamental policy questions of how much to raise of what crops becomes a function of the level of non-farm income, as modified by our needs in soil and resource conservation. And the overwhelming component of non-farm income is wages. I take it that from here on out our agricultural policy-makers will chart their course upon actual or anticipated trends in wages. All this means that the maintenance of prosperity for American agriculture depends mainly upon the maintenance of heavy or full employment and the spread of the high levels of consumption which accompany a pervasively high-wage structure. Labor works for such a structure, and thereby lays the basis for high income for farmers.

Correspondingly, labor wants farm income high, and wishes it spread widely among the farm population. The lower-income two-thirds of American farmers are still the nation's greatest beckoning market for city-made goods. Labor will not begrudge country people the actual earnings that will equip country homes with the conveniences and comforts that are standard in city homes, and farms with the machines that can lessen the hours of labor in the country.

I have said that among labor's objectives is a broadened political democracy. It is in this field that a whole new prospect of farmer-labor cooperation opens before us. Labor and farmers between them make up eighty-five per cent of the people of the United States. If they would pool their voting strength, they could provide a President and a Congress responsive to their wishes. Let us examine the general objectives that labor has in mind in its political effort, and see which of them would work to the detriment of farmers.

Labor has consistently stood for more education, and for the Federal aid to education which would equalize school opportunities in the many agricultural states. Most farmers are for that.

Labor wants more vocational and technical education. Surely when agriculture confronts a loss of people from mechanization and attendant changes, it is common sense to dot our countryside with area vocational schools, which can enable those who leave the country to light on their feet when they get to town.

Labor has favored social security, and has wished it broadened to include domestic and agricultural workers. My guess is that the majority of rural-dwellers would like that.

Labor wants a broad program of health and medical care. Farm people get the short end of the stick in matters of health, and should favor measures to get them doctors and hospitals.

Labor is for housing, including public housing and public rural housing. It has pushed the sort of rural housing program that was in the last version of the Taft-Ellender-Wagner Housing Bill, that passed the Senate. That's a good program, which would help rural people a lot.

Labor is in favor of cooperatives, both of producers and consumers, and wishes by their increase to lessen the spread between prices to the farmer and prices in the store.

Labor has consistently supported whatever plans and measures were in circulation to uphold and improve the position of the family-type farmer. The American Federation of Labor worked with the Farmers' Alliance in the old days. Both great branches of today's labor movement lent their support to the program of the former Farm Security Administration, in its work of helping the smaller farmers into better status, and in backing farm-ownership for tenants. Labor sees the family-farmer as its friend, wedded to democratic standards. Labor will be generally sympathetic to the measures of reorganization of land-control in the cotton belt that were current in the hearings before the Pace Committee. It must be said, however, that labor can be expected to use its own political pressure vigorously in the direction of preventing, as those measures of reorganization proceed, any careless shoving to "somewhere else" of the people who will lose out when Southern cotton farms are reduced in numbers and enlarged in size to the 175-acre and up holdings that are being discussed. And it will also be found increasingly active in assistance to the semi-industrialized labor force that mechanization will bring.

It is only right that this farm labor force, migratory or otherwise, should share fully in the American standard of living. Labor can be expected to help protect it, by resisting importation of Mexican and West Indian labor as long as underpaid people are available at home; by working for Federal supervision of camps; and by direct organizational aid, as through the National Farm Labor Union. Labor will have noted the recent statement before the Georgia Cotton Manufacturers Association of the President of the Georgia Farm Bureau (May 5, at Daytona Beach, Florida, reported in Atlanta (Ga.) Journal of May 6, 1948) in which he was quoted as having said that farm leaders will oppose "to the bitter end" any effort on the part of present unions to organize farm labor, and that this stand was not vindictive but was necessary "if the form of economy under which we operate is to be preserved." Labor believes in freedom of organization.

Lastly, labor would welcome fully representative self-organization among American farmers. It is convinced that much present farm organization is unduly influenced by big landlords and commercial and manufacturing interests. It has had experience of the teamwork of big business lobbies and the major farm organizations. It is making its own salvation by its own organized efforts; it would consider that the basic problems of American agriculture would be much further along toward solution if the family farmers, whether tenants or owners, were strongly and broadly organized, in an association or union in the policies of which they had control.

Dear Mr. Corbett:

Thank you for your kind letter. I am sorry that having to be at Nashville the next morning took me away from Berea so quickly. At that, it is something of a miracle to get from Berea to Nashville overnight, but it was done!

I deliberately undertook to introduce a bit of controversy; apparently the amount was excessive. But I greatly enjoyed being with the group.

Sincerely,

NEWS LETTER

AMERICAN COUNTRY LIFE ASSOCIATION, INC.

Headquarters Office
3166 North Eighteenth Street
Arlington, Virginia

RECEIVED
AUG 11 1948
Southern Regional Council

August 6, 1948

To: FRIENDS AND MEMBERS OF ACLA

Subject: The Berea Meeting

This news letter from ACLA headquarters has two purposes: The first is to report upon the present status of the organization. The second is to give members and friends who were not there the highlights of the Berea meeting.

OUR STATUS

As to status, there has been a revival of vigor and an increased awareness of the importance and distinctiveness of ACLA in contemporary American life. No ACLA member, new or old, doubts that there needs to be a forum at which the end product of the many influences bearing upon rural life can be appraised by persons representing wide ranges of interest and views. It is also agreed that no other organization provides such a forum.

OUR FINANCES

We are financially penniless. Our cash carry-over into the new year will be only two or three hundred dollars. Membership dues are our principal and only certain source of revenue. But we are not worried about finances and we will not worry you about finances. We have no plans contingent upon gifts from foundations or upon the outcome of fund-raising efforts. We will not spend money before we get it. We will not build up a deficit. But we can make some very good bricks with very few straws. That in brief is ACLA's financial policy. With your help and moral support we can and will carry it out. All our energies will be devoted to building a worthwhile program.

OUR HOSTS AT BEREA

Now about Berea. This unique and well-equipped educational institution, serving sons and daughters of mountain folk in the Appalachian area of a half dozen Southern and border states, was an ideal setting for the twenty-seventh ACLA conference. Accommodations were good and costs were modest. The welcome extended by President Hutchins was cordial. The dairy herd, the beef animals, the poultry flock, the truck gardens, the creamery, the bakery, the cannery, the looms, the college-owned hotel, the college-owned store - all these and other features intrigued everyone. Students work in the establishments mentioned while they perform fully accredited classroom work leading to the usual college degrees.

THE BEREA PROGRAM

As for the Berea ACLA program, it rates with the best of ACLA history. All paid-up members will receive copies of the papers and prepared discussions. The Farm Foundation, through the courtesy of Frank Peck and Joe Ackerman (and without establishing a precedent), is now duplicating conference papers and they will be mailed soon. No one familiar with their content would hesitate to pay a year's dues for the sake of having them in his files. There will be no printed proceedings The way to get the excellent Berea papers is to get your name on the "member in good standing" list, if it is not already there.

Raymond Ogg, new head of the American Farm Bureau Federation's Department of International Affairs, and Ransom Aldrich, President of the Mississippi Farm Bureau, ably presented Farm Bureau thinking on worldwide and domestic issues affecting rural life. Lloyd Halvorson, economist for the National Grange, did the same thing for his organization and Angus MacDonald of the Washington staff of the National Farmers Union, discussed the stand of his organization on public issues. The general farm organizations were better represented at the meeting and on the program than they have been for years.

Mrs. Haven Smith, vice president of the Nebraska Farm Bureau Federation, presented a paper full of human interest and significant information on current trends in rural communities, proving conclusively that character and talent have suffered no impairment through eleven successive generations of farm life which she exemplifies.

H. C. M. Case, head of the Department of Agricultural Economics at the University of Illinois, reviewed in a most able and statesmanlike manner present developments related to long-range agricultural policy.

Sherman E. Johnson of the Bureau of Agricultural Economics of the U. S. Department of Agriculture made a valuable contribution to the program from the point of view of economists. David E. Lindstrom of the University of Illinois, Howard Beers of the University of Kentucky, and W. H. Stacy of Iowa State College were chief spokesmen for sociologists.

Tom Tripp of the Board of Home Missions for the Congregational Christian Church, and Emerson Hynes of the National Catholic Rural Life Conference found wide areas for Protestant and Catholic agreement in matters relating to number and size of farms and how to improve rural communities.

Joseph Ackerman, the Association's president, led off the discussion on the number and size of American farms, with a scholarly paper. M. L. Mosher of the Department of Agricultural Economics of the University of Illinois presented important research data on the effect of size of farms on total volume of production, efficiency of production, manpower requirements, and soil conservation. George Mitchell, Director of the Southern Regional Council, sketched the economic and social development in Southern states and interpreted the current situation in the light of a century and a half of history.

Ransom Aldrich took issue with some of Dr. Mitchell's premises and conclusions. Thomas A. Hendricks discussed health problems of rural communities from the viewpoint of the American Medical Association which he represents. His address touched off a lively discussion. Incidentally, there were many lively discussions. Frank W. Peck, head of the Farm Foundation, Dean Frank J. Welch of Mississippi State College of Agriculture, and R. K. Bliss of the Iowa Extension Service, made short but important statements.

BUSINESS MATTERS

Howard Beers of the University of Kentucky, Miss Guntor Johanneson on the staff of the Wisconsin Agriculturalist and Farmer, Sherman E. Johnson of the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, and Arthur Floyd of Tuskegee Institute were all elected to the Board of Directors. They replace Dean E. L. Anthony of Michigan State College, Mrs. Loleta D. Fyan of the Michigan State Library, and F. D. Patterson of Tuskegee Institute, whose terms have expired. The new officers are: President, Roger B. Corbett, Vice Dean and Director, College of Agriculture, University of Maryland; Vice President, Milo K. Swanton, Wisconsin Council of Agricultural Cooperatives; Executive Secretary, Paul V. Maris, Farmers Home Administration; Treasurer, R. K. Bliss, Iowa State College; and Custodian, J. Edwin Losey of Purdue University, succeeding Dr. O. F. Hall.

The new Executive Committee consists of Roger Corbett, President, Joseph Ackerman, immediate past Vice President, Milo K. Swanton, Vice President, R. K. Bliss, Treasurer, Lois M. Clark, Wilfred Shaw, and Thomas A. Tripp.

AS FOR THE FUTURE

There was one regrettable fact about the Berea meeting. The attendance did not measure up to the quality of the program. An eleventh hour change of meeting places was partly responsible. Largely, however, limited attendance was the aftermath of the policy necessarily followed during and immediately after the war. The Board has agreed that the time is ripe for a new policy in this respect. We hope to continue and enlarge upon our nationwide membership of individuals and organizations. In addition, we will strive for a large attendance from the area surrounding the annual meeting place.

The future of ACLA was discussed by the officers and directors. Tentative plans have been formulated as to the time and place of the next meeting and the character of the next program. As they unfold you will be advised.

Meanwhile, please pass along the word that ACLA is a vital and going concern with a job to do that needs to be done, and a will to do it.

Sincerely yours,

Roger Corbett

Mr. George Mitchell

Dear Mr. Mitchell:

The increase in support for forward-looking action since November 2 has encouraged many Southerners to believe the present moment is the time for their section to offer more positive leadership to the country.

It is our belief that Americans for Democratic Action -- which, as you know, has become an effective focal point for non-Communist liberal activity nationally -- can be the agency in which, and through which, liberals in the South can communicate with each other, and work out common plans for action.

With this objective, many Southerners have been consulted by John Thomason of Greensboro, N.C., who is arranging a small conference to discuss ADA's role in the South. The response has been most encouraging. Mrs. M. E. Tilly of Georgia, Dr. Frank P. Graham of North Carolina, and Mr. Hodding Carter of Mississippi (who are among those who have urged such a conference) have authorized me to extend to you, in their behalf, this invitation to participate in a discussion of the key problems we face.

The meeting will be held at 353 Courtland Street, N.E., Atlanta, Ga., Saturday and Sunday, February 19 and 20, beginning at 9:30 a.m. Satruday. Participants will be limited to some 30 persons who have shown an interest in seeing a greater degree of coordination among Southern liberals. Although we should like to invite a large number of our friends in the South, we believe a smaller meeting will produce a more concrete program.

Since ADA has no desire to exploit the meeting in publicity, no press releases will be issued before or after the conference. The aim is to hold an off-the-record meeting, to hammer out liberal strategy in the South.

We are very anxious to have your participation on February 19 and 20. Would you inform John Thomason, 603 Kenilworth Street, Greensboro, N.C., whether we can count on your presence? Would you also indicate, on the enclosed card, the room reservations you will need at the Ansley Hotel, unless you wish to make other arrangements?

Most cordially yours,

James Loeb, Jr.

Dear Dr.Mitchell:

If I have been slow in acknowledging the kindness and helpfulness you showed my wife and myself during our stay in Atlanta,please don't ascribe it to ingratitude,but rather to the fact that since our departure we have had to cover a lot of territory in a very limited time,and what with trying to catch up with my journalistic writing I have simply had to relegate my letter-writing duties to second place.

We both appreciated very much both the information and the views you so readily gave us,the trouble you went to in taking us on that Saturday afternoon swing out to Stockbridge,and your friendly invitation to dinner in your home. Incidentally,I used the visit to Jack Dodson's farm-place as the introduction to a series of three articles about Georgia which I sent to my paper. Unfortunately,the pictures I tried to take didn't come out too well - I am an indifferent photographer at best,and this time I managed to double-expose then picture of the two Dodsons. I think I recouped however,from the point of view of getting illustrations for my articles,by sending over some general pictures of farming in Georgia which I got from elsewhere.

Since leaving you,I have been to Oak Ridge,to Memphis,down along the Mississippi to Natchez (where the Mayor told me that municipal finances are based to a considerable part on taxing liquor sales and gambling - both of which are illegal in the state!),and to New Orleans, where we spent four whole days. Although one of them was mainly occupied by listening to ten hours of continuous thunder and 6.2 inches of cloudburst rain,we managed to see most of the high-spots,I think,and I even spent one morning in a marsh-land pilfield that was quite a surprise to me.

Here in Fort Worth I have been taken in hand by people who have kindly shown me what cowboying is and is not,which will furnish the material for another article I hope will be interesting to my countrymen, who only know what is in the Western films and books. We are going on to-morrow to Santa Fe,and from there to Phoenix and the Grand Canyon before setting out for California.

May I ask you to convey my wife's and my own warmest regards and thanks also to Mrs.Mitchell?

Sincerely yours

Frankfort, Kentucky

Dear Mr. Atwood:

Many thanks. I will set aside May 12 to be in Frankfort, for any service I can do the College.

I haven't looked up buses, but I can guarantee to be on the campus by a few minutes to nine on the 12th. I ought to go out early that afternoon toward Richmond and Berea.

My highest ambition is to lecture to a class or two.

If you should have changes later in your plans, I can be reached at the Lafayette Hotel in Lexington on the 10th, and richly on the 11th.

Sincerely,

George S. Mitchell

My dear Dr. Mitchell:

Thank you for your very kind letter of April 26.

We will be pleased to assemble a group of interested students and teachers for you whenever you can visit our institution. It will be helpful if you can give me a day's notice of the time of your arrival. I am setting it down tentatively for May 12. We will also be pleased to provide any other entertainment such as housing and food which your journey may require.

On May 10, at 10:00 a. m., I am speaking before a group of white women at the St. Paul Evangelical Church in Louisville, Kentucky, my subject is "The Day Law".

Very sincerely yours,

Dear Mr. Atwood:

I promised to make a talk Tuesday night, May 10, for the Catholic Committee of the South at Lexington, Kentucky. That puts me in your general territory.

I have written to Berea and asked if they want any free speech-making done, on the morning of the 10th or in the course of the 11th or 12th. I don't know what they will answer.

Meanwhile, I thought I would inquire whether you would want any chapel talking or classroom teaching done for your students. I don't know exactly when I will be free, but I could probably fit anything you might need on the 12th.

Don't be in the least embarrassed if this offer doesn't fit the college's needs. It does help the Council to reach students, and as a sometime professor, I show old firehorse signs every now and then of wanting harness.

Sincerely,

George S. Mitchell

Thank you for your note of May 18, ordering a copy of "America's Tenth Man". It is being sent separately. You may be interested in the April issue of New South (enclosed) with statements of southern churches about human rights.

I caught a fleeting glimpse of you last May at Pendle Hill (perhaps on the steps of the New House) when I was there for QIVS orientation. Just last week I heard John Ramsay (of the CIO) comment on the fine job you did at a conference in which you both participated recently. As I understood it, he would have felt rather lonely at the conference, had it not been for thee!

Dear George:

Want to thank you for the delightful entertainment in your beautiful home. Mrs. Avent knew the house by my description and she was very happy to know that I had an opportunity to see the house in the inside. The fellowship with you and our friends was very good.

I hope you folks can persuade Ellis Arnall to run again. I do not think it wise, though, that he make too many deals and compromises. I realize one cannot be an absolutist, and I am not one myself; but people look to Arnall as a moral leader and when he ties up with Rivers he gets a lot of dirt washed out over him. You know what I mean. Pardon the figure of speech.

Best of everything..I hope to see you frequently.

Dear George:

By all means count me in on those attending the meeting with Mrs. Tilly. There are some members of our faculty and staff who might be good prospects. Dr. John Anderson, our psychology teacher, is the type member you would welcome. Miss Ethel Millar, a friend of Mrs. Tilly, said she would like to see Mrs. Tilly. I think both of these folks should be of help. There is a new political science teacher coming here to teach this year. He is coming to us from the graduate school at Chapel Hill. If he seems the type I'll try to interest him in the meeting. Be sure that we are informed. I suppose the meeting will be in Little Rock.

I'd be interested to know whether there is any ground swell of sentiment developing for Arnall to run. But I'll get that information from Mrs. Tilly. You might ask her to find out what she can about the status of the new Bible teacher at Wesleyan. I understand she is in hot water. Said something Christian or liberal.....anyhow, she offended some old fundamentalist sister who had given Wesleyan a little money. You know the rest.

Sincerely your friend,

Dear Mr. Henderson:

A couple of weeks ago our Council got out this pamphlet. It is popular already. Time and Newsweek have both picked it up and given it good stories. N.C. Mutual Life Insurance Company bought a thousand to mail to policy holders. Various church groups have bought it in blocks, five hundred or so at a time, to get out. The Southern Newspaper Publishers Association has already sent it to all the white papers in the South.

The next thing is to get it into the hands of interested readers of the papers all over the South. I can think of no group which would be as ready as yours to see the possibilities of a local action program based on this pamphlet. The thing we hope for is that in town after town across the South small committees, preferably of both races, will go, little green book in hand, to their editor and ask for his best effort in following the book's rules.

I would be most grateful if you would consider seriously whether the American Council on Human Rights, or its component organizations, could in some way purchase a sizable batch of the pamphlets and get them out to people who could use them effectively.

It isn't as though this idea were brand new in the South. Many papers have been doing a good deal better in the last two or three years. This can greatly swell and importantly shape an already perceptible movement.

Sincerely,

George S. Mitchell

MEMORANDUM

October 13, 1949
Dict. October 12

TO: GSM
FROM: HCF

Last night I talked to Ted Friedman, the Anti-Defamation League guy in Raleigh. He said that groups in Portsmouth and Raleigh both wanted you to speak to them on November 22 or 23. He said if either of those dates were possible, you could take your pick of the place, but he thought you might do more good in Portsmouth. I promised him I would pass this on to ~~Dick~~ and that you would write him about availability.

Morris Abram called today apropos of a current attempt to get Dick Rich to pay for publication of a leaflet on the Southwide Conference of Church Women. (You may or may not think this is a good idea; it was initiated by Alex in a talk with Mrs. Tilly.)

Morris said that Dick Rich had a number of questions about the conference and its follow-up and is also interested in the Southern Regional Council. He suggested that it would be an excellent opportunity for you to visit Mr. Rich, inform him about the Council, and further your relationship with him. (Do you know him?) Mrs. Tilly knows about this. You will probably want to talk with her further about it.

In gathering material for the 1949 report, we have come across a newspaper clipping which states that on January 26, 1949 a bill was introduced in the Georgia Senate to prevent foreign-born persons from holding elective state offices. I have written to the Secretary of State of Georgia, asking whether or not this bill passed either House, was reported favorably by a committee, and so on. Today I received his reply, stating that the information was not "available for distribution." Dear Mrs. Abram:

Here is a paragraph from a letter I got today from the professor of sociology at Winthrop, an old friend of mine named Dorothy Jones.

"During the S. C. Conference of Social Work I had the pleasure of attending the morning session of the Southern Regional Council meeting. It was far and away the most excellent section of the Conference, in my opinion. The speaker, M . Morris Abram, a lawyer from Atlanta, was absolutely superb."

Dear Mr. Fleming:

Thank you very much for your letter of December 5 and for the copy of Dr. McFall's survey of hospital facilities for Negroes in South Carolina. Before using this material I shall certainly get his consent.

The Bulletin of the Medical College of the State of South Carolina is published quarterly. As it happens our next issue is rather crowded with reports of the recent Post-Graduate Seminar but I hope I shall be able to use your material in the spring issue.

Very truly yours,

December 22, '49

Dear Lois,

Chattanooga has an independent, local Interracial Committee. I know little about it, but think it does some good every now and then. Maybe someday it will join our (quite separate) Tennessee Division of the Southern Regional Council, but it hasn't yet.

Here are the State Divisions:

Florida Division of the Southern Regional Council
Wm. W. Gibbs, Ingraham Bldg., Miami, Fla., Bhairman
Kentucky Division etc etc
J. M. Tydings, Lincoln Institute, Lincoln Ridge, Ky., Chrmn.
Mississippi Division etc
The Rev. Mr. H. Brent Schaeffer, 1525 Robinson St., Jackson, Miss., Chrmn.
South Carolina etc.
J. M. Dabbs, RFD 1 , Mayesville, S.C., Chrmn
Alabama Division, etc.
A. D. Beittel, Talladega College, Talladega., Chrmn.
Tennessee Divisionetc
Alfred Mynders, Chattanooga Times, Chattanooga, Chrmn.

Dear George:

Sometime ago, The Saturday Evening Post (7/30/49) referred to the Chattanooga Interracial Committee, and last year in a news clipping from the Chattanooga Times, the Tennessee Division of the Southern Regional Council was mentioned. Are these the same agency or two separate bodies? We would appreciate any information you can give us about them including correct name of agency, address, and name of executive or chairman.

If you have such a list which you could conveniently send us, we would find it helpful if you have the names and addresses of all of the various state divisions of the Southern Regional Council.

I will be in Georgia after Christmas for several weeks and will doubtless be seeing you and Mrs. Tilly. As you probably know, my work with the Council will be completed this month.

Chapel Hill, North Carolina

Dear Dr. Alexander:

It is indeed kind and generous of you to wish to contribute your expenses for the trip to Atlanta. It does help us a great deal.

Because I thought you would want your contribution to show up on our books, I sent you the check. You may either endorse it and return it to us or write another check for that amount. In this way the contribution passes through our cash receipts book and is considerably easier to account. This is some extra nuisance but does clarify the record keeping.

I enclose a receipt in the event that you may wish to consider the contribution as tax deductible.

We do hope the farm is prospering. Do come and see us when you can.

Dear Mr. Annoyer:

I happen to subscribe to the Pembroke Progress, which in its March 2 issue carried brief notice of your appearance at Red Springs High School.

Our Council has been feeling about for ways in which to get advantage taken of the presence in the South of numerous students from Africa. I have tried to get contacts worked out through colleges and churches. It would help everybody if the various institutions, particularly white ones, would use this remarkable opportunity to learn about things in Africa.

Will you be good enough to write me advice on the subject?

Parnell Loses Cash And Checks

Burglars early Wednesday morning took about $2500 in cash and endorsed checks from a five-ton safe in the J. Q. Parnell store at Parkton.

The dial box of the safe was cut open with an acetylene cutting tool and Sheriff Willis G. Britt described the job as the work of professionals.

Identification Officer E. W. Britt of the Sheriff's Department reported that several clues were being followed.

State Bureau of Investigation also was called in to aid ine investigation.

Deputies Paul McMillan and Jimmie Kinlaw of Parkton also joined in the preliminary investigation.

The safe robbery occurred some time between Tuesday midnight and daylight Wednesday, the Sheriff's Department said.

Entrance to the store was gained by breaking through the front door. The burglars then used bolt cutters to open the rear door and brought their truck around to the back door during the robbery, officers said.

The acetylene torch was brought for the job, but a crowbar, a pipe wrench and an axe were taken from the Parnell store's stock for use in wrecking the door of the huge safe.

Inside dimensions of the safe are approximately five feet, by fiv feet, by 30 inches deep. It is set into a concrete base.

Braves End Schedule This Week

Pembroke State College Braves will end their 1949-50 home basketball schedule this weekend against two strong opponents from Fort Bragg. Friday night the Braves are host to the 325 Ordance Division. Saturday Pembroke takes on the 14th Quartermaster's Corp.

Last month the Braves won a thriling 58 to 55 game from the 325 and Saturday night the 14th Ordance handed the Pembroke All-Stars their first defeat of the season. The Braves have an overall season record of 22 wins and 7 defeats, including wins over Louisburg, E. M. I. and Campbell college.

In the preliminary games the Pembroke girls play Fairmont Friday and Union Chapl Saturday. Large crowds are expected to see Captain Ned Sampson and company conclude this seasons play.

Orphanage Work Day Is Planned

Another work day at the Pembroke Orphanage has been set for Wednesday, March 22, beginning at 8 A. M., for the men. The ladies will come later and bring the lunch for the noon hour. The ladies will also bring linens, (sheets, pillow cases, towels, wash cloths, etc.) for the linen shower for the orphanage.

It is hoped that some 200 men will be present at this work day as there still remains quite a bit of work to be done.

of the Sheriff's Department reported that several clues were being followed.

State Bureau of Investigation also was called in to aid ine investigation.

Deputies Paul McMillan and Jimmie Kinlaw of Parkton also joined in the preliminary investigation.

The safe robbery occurred some time between Tuesday midnight and daylight Wednesday, the Sheriff's Department said.

Entrance to the store was gained by breaking through the front door. The burglars then used bolt cutters to open the rear door and brought their truck around to the back door during the robbery, officers said.

The acetylene torch was brought for the job, but a crowbar, a pipe wrench and an axe were taken from the Parnell store's stock for use in wrecking the door of the huge safe.

Inside dimensions of the safe are approximately five feet, by fiv feet, by 30 inches deep. It is set into a concrete base.

McLeod Files For Sheriff

Malcolm McLeod, the genial wholesale grocerman who last week announced that he was a candidate for the office of sheriff of Robeson county, officially filed for that officetoday.

Mr. McLeod states that he has adopted the slogan of "A Big Man for a Big Job," and was today putting out posters while on his rounds of Robeson county's grocery stores. The posters bear that slogan. Part of that big man business is due to his size as he stands over six feet and his weight is well over the 225 pound mark.

Mr. McLeod states that he is heartily in favor of the countywide police radio system for the sheriff's department, as recommended by the grand jury and by the Robeson County Association of municipal officials, and that he would also like to see established in the county sheriff's department an identification bureau.

He states that he feels that such a bureau, with trained personnel, would greatly advance criminal investigation in the county.

"I feel that the sheriff's department should have full advantage of these modern criminal detection devices and that we should make use of the fine opportunities afforded us by the Institute of Government, the State and Federal Bureaus of Investigation in training personnel and in establishing such a bureau right here in Robeson County," Mr. McLeod stated.

Miss Louise Carter Has Picture In School Paper

The picture of Miss Louise Carter, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Marvin Carter of Pembroke and now a student at Baxter Seminary, Baxter, Tennessee, was carried with a news item recently in the "Black and Gold," the Baxtr Seminary paper, which stated that she was rpresentative at the second meeting of the Upper Cumberland Press association held in Cookville, Tennessee. Miss Carter was a staff member from Baxter.

Rev. D. F. Lowry Chapel Speaker

The Rev. D. F. Lowry, "the first graduate of Pembroke State College," spoke at the chapel exercises on Thursday morning on the subject, "Living in an Ordered World."

Among other things, Mr. Lowry stressed the importance of taking advantage of one's opportunities, not being too critical, realizing that everything worth while costs, thinking clearly ,soaring above things which are detrimental, not being afraid of life, being prepared, never taking advantages of anyone, being kind, upright and merciful and facing the world squarely.

He concluded with the poem "Great Wide Beautiful, Wonderful World."

married and the father of two small children.

The Highway Patrol report showed that the truck hit under the cab of the right side of the engine, 27 feet from the front of the engine.

E. H. Bowie of Florence, engineer of the train, told officers that he had blown his whistle for the crossing and that when he saw the truck was not going to stop, he applied his brakes.

The truck broke the line to the air brakes and the train was stopped through use of the hand brake

Line of vision was uninterrupted for about 500 yards along the track in the direction from which the train approached the crossing, the patrol report said.

The funeral was held Wednesday morning at 10:30 from Oakdale church with the pastor, Rev. Elliott Britt, officiating.

Surviving are the wife, the former Miss Miriam Edwards, and two children, Jerry, 2, and Burney, 1; the parents, Mr. and Mrs. B. N. Evans, three brothers, Woodrow Evans, B. M. Evans, Jr., and Blanco Evans, all of South Robeson community; and two sisters, Mrs. Roland Spivey of South Robeson and Mrs. Jimm Burchett of Dayton, Ohio.

FMC SOCIAL NOTES

Wilma Ratchford, of Gastonia and Sophia Zae, of Strasburg were speakers at the regular meeting of the Flora Macdonald college student International Relations club, held in one of the college parlors on Wednesday evening.

They held a spirited discussion on "Why and Why Not the United States Was Justified in Getting Out of China," with Miss Ratchford outlining the reasons in favor of the move, and Miss Zae pointing out the mistake of the action. The program was in charge of Dewie Buie, of Norfolk.

The club president, Anna Jordan, of Bishopville, S. C., presided at the business meeting, at which time Katrina Hubble, of Bland, and Nell Lowe, of Clinton, were appointed to represent the club at the regional IRC convention in Harrisonburg, Va., March 15-16. The president, Miss Jordan, will also attend the regional meeting.

The theme of the freshman-sophomore dance at Flora Macdonald college on Saturday evening, "Dreamer's Holiday," was accented in phrases from the song in various phases of the decorations. The rotunda at the entrance to the dance hall was overhung with a simulated soft blue sky, studded with stars, and the dancers in the opening figure emerged from behind a huge blue and silver butterfly—just opposite, a silver half-moon formed the bandstand for the orchestra. The backdrop showed a couple sitting on a misty cloud, with silvery figures underneath, representing the "Dreamer's Holiday."

Refreshments were served in the rotunda during second intermission. Sixty couples danced to the music of Syd Davis and his orchestra from Rocky Mount. Chaperons were Dr. and Mrs. Marshall Scott Woodson, Mrs. Hinton McLeod, Miss Ethel Bateman, Mr. and Mrs. Leslie Bullock, and William G. Coxhead.

GIVE THE PERSON YOU ARE TELEPHONING TIME TO ANSWER

Wait at Least 10 Rings

Very often the person you are telephoning cannot drop everything to answer the telephone. So, when telephoning, it's a wise policy to wait a minute—that's ten rings—before hanging up.

This gives the person you are calling a reasonable time to answer. You'll also be likely to complete a lot more telephone calls this way. And your consideration will help us to serve everyone more efficiently by cutting down the number of "incompleted" calls. So always wait 10 rings—won't you, please?

Dear Mr. Mitchell:

Thank you for sending me the clipping from the New York Times, of March 22, 1950.

To publish this in one of our publications would indicate approval of The American Legion of this project.

This would have to clear our National Executive Committee Meeting in Indianapolis, May 3-5, 1950, for such approval.

It is suggested that you take this through the Department of Georgia, The American Legion. If it is something The American Legion should take cognizance of, endorsement by the Georgia Department would be necessary for consideration by the NEC.

It was nice to hear from you again. I hope our paths will cross some day in the near future.

Very truly yours,

May 22, 1950

Atlanta & West Point Railroad Company
4 Hunter Street, S. E.
Atlanta, Georgia

Gentlemen:

I had a visit a few mornings ago from a Negro passenger on one of your runs who thought that the Railroad had been less than reasonably considerate of the large group of passengers in the single coach assigned to Negroes.

I believe she boarded the Silver Comet at Athens, purchasing a round trip to Chehaw, Alabama, and return, Saturday, May 13. Reserved seats were assigned, and the Negro passengers hoped for tolerable comfort for the entire trip. This was duly provided in the Seaboard end of the journey from Athens to Atlanta. The single coach continued in the train westward from Atlanta. A very large number of Negro passengers entered the coach at Atlanta, mainly bound for Chehaw, but others for Alabama way stations. Within that coach from Atlanta westward to Chehaw, many passengers had to stand, while others tried to sit three to a seat. My visitor had occasion to use the diner and in the trip to the diner observed a very large amount of empty space in the other (and presumably white) coaches. She supposed that greater consideration could have at the least opened additional space in the other coaches for the Negro passengers.

I am of course aware of the many complications: the strike, and the probable failure of many of the Negro passengers going to the Commencement exercises at Tuskegee Institute to book space in advance and give the Company advance knowledge of their need of accommodations.

I am sure the Company desires to be informed of instances of this kind, and I am equally sure that you wish to make travel as agreeable and comfortable as you can.

Sincerely,

George S. Mitchell

Dear Mr. Douglass:

I do hope that by reason of your interest in home missions work you will find time to read through the little account here given of African students in Southern Colleges.

It would be quite a useful thing if some of your local people concerned with home or foreign missions would get in touch with the Colleges where the African students are, and try to work out some plan that would bring one or two or three of them into some contact with the local churches. What I have in mind is some occasion when a team from among the African students might visit an appropriate mission study or other group and talk with them about relationships between America and modern African movements.

Dear Mr. Mitchell:

Thanks very much for the literature on the Council. I had heard of New South on several occasions but had not seen copies before. It's quite an interesting publication.

I was quite interested, too, to see that Mrs. Spearman is Executive Secretary of the SouthCarolina Division. I know Mrs. Spearman quite well, as she is a member of the same church as I in Newberry, So.Car. She is, I think, about the only liberal I know in South Carolina. The few other Southern liberals that I know I have met outside the South.

I am enclosing two dollars U.S. for membership in the Council. I believe you neglected to include the price list of your pamphlets, so you might enclose that with the first issue of New South that you send me.

Dear Friend:

You should pay close attention to the enclosed minutes which outline the first steps organizing the Atlanta Labor Education Association. Important things remain to be done before services can be offered to the organized labor groups in this area.

The group that met on June 17 discussed some of the possible methods of raising funds for the minimum program. Several reports were made of potential sources. However, it seems that some of this money would not be available immediately. Our practical goal, which all of us that are interested must face squarely at this time, is to raise the first $500 by the 15th of July.

It was suggested that each of the interested persons who have been discussing the total project make a financial expression of that interest. Ten dollars was the suggested amount - we stand ready to accept more. It should be clearly understood that this is not a formal requirement, and that the thing that we need most is sincere interest and the sort of participation that such interest would dictate.

Substantial commitments of cooperation have come from some twenty persons. There is a definite interest in this project on the part of a good portion of the labor movement. The staff of Georgia Workers Education Service has donated over $500 of equipment to ALEA.

The interest shown thus far in ALEA has been sufficient to stir a feeling of optimism, but some of us should feel that such a project will develop easily. The executive secretary can assure you that your advice, determination, and support will be needed now and throughout the year. It is felt that those who have signified interest have known that it would mean interest over a period of time and not just for the initial stages.

You will notice that the executive secretary is temporarily acting as treasurer. He does not have the authority to disburse funds. He does have the authority to receive them, however. It should be understood that the responsibility of money handling, bookkeeping, and fund-raising will be turned over to elected officers. The executive secretary's job will be primarily concerned with program promotion and coordination.

Art Kidder with the ILGWU Training Institute in New York has been giving increasingly of himself in the attempt to get union support from that end of the line. He has already done more than could be asked, and is ahead of those of us in Atlanta by a good bit. The importance of local support in terms of a successful program and further outside support cannot be overemphasized.

You are asked to do what you can personally and in contact with others for the furtherance of ALEA. Make checks payable to Emory F. Via, treasurer, ALEA.

Also, you are requested to stand ready to attend the next meeting of ALEA, which will come during the first two weeks of July. You will be notified. We must finish the formal organization of ALEA at that time.

Sincerely and fraternally,

Emory F. Via

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON A CONTINUING LABOR EDUCATION PROJECT IN ATLANTA

Present at Meeting of June 17: Ralph Purcell, George Mitchell, Art Levin, Les Persells, Carmen Lucia, Olive Haskins, Ruth Warren, Emory Via.

Meeting was called to order at 2 p.m. on June 17, with Ralph Purcell acting as chairman. Report was received from the smaller committee which met on June 6. It recommended two overall plans; one to be adopted as the final plan of procedure. The first plan, known as the minimum program, would consist of a volunteer staff, a minimum budget of $500, minimum office space, and a formal organization with officers, a board, and a finance committee empowered to raise funds. The second plan presented called for a budget of $7,000, one full-time staff person, a part-time office person, suitable office space, and a formal organization with officers, board, and finance committee.

The group discussed again some of the possibilities of workers education in the area and reviewed the resources and commitments presently at our disposal. This review included the local scene and the work done by Art Elder in New York. Elder has reported encouraging responses from several sources in the New York area.

A motion was made and carried that the minimum program be accepted.

It was agreed that the new organization should have $500 in cash or rental space before proceeding to offer programs.

The new project will be known as the Atlanta Labor Education Association.

A motion was made and passed that those present and those invited who have expressed such interest shall assume the organization of the Atlanta Labor Education Association.

A motion was made and carried to elect Emory F. Via as executive secretary of ALEA, on a voluntary basis.

A motion was made and carried instructing Emory Via to present at the next meeting a list of other persons who shall constitute further membership.

A motion was made and carried to combine temporarily the offices of executive secretary and treasurer.

A motion was made and carried that the treasurer shall have no authority to disburse funds except to a duly elected successor.

The meeting was adjourned at 4 p.m.

Dear Mr. Mitchell:

Dr. Morse has asked me to "reply and take appropriate action" on your June 21st letter to him. You suggest an interesting challenge.

Do I understand that you would have teams of African students who would be sent around the United States, qualified to appear before missionary study groups? Miss Elsie Penfield, in charge of our Department of Women's Organizations, does a great deal of itinerating missionary speakers among missionary societies of self-supporting churches. I am referring your suggestion to her and if you have any further ideas, I would suggest that you write directly to Miss Penfield at this address.

Dear Mr. Mitchell:

I am just in receipt of your letter of June 12 with enclosed copy of "New South" and I have read with interest the article dealing with the matter of African students who are enrolled in colleges throughout the South.

I am not just sure what we may be able to do in this connection. I note that there are no such students enrolled in either of our two Negro schools nor do we probably have any members of our communion among these African students since all of our foreign mission work in Africa is in the Belgian Congo and the Belgian Colonial Government will not permit us to bring any young people to America to study. We have sought at various times to get some of our most promising African young men to America for purposes of study but the Belgian Government seems to be adamant in this regard.

We will bear this whole matter of African students in America in mind and do what we can to show them friendship.

During the past year we have become interested, here at our college, in the work you are doing. From your literature and the New South, we have attempted to learn of your enlightened and democratic program.

The teachers we train here go out into many New Jersey communities where there is considerable racial discrimination. We, therefore, have a professional interest in your success.

It is my hope to be in Atlanta some time during the first week in September. Might it be possible to visit your offices or talk with some of your organization in order to personalize our contact with your fine work?

Dear Friend:

The American system of education has been a bulwark of our democratic heritage almost since its inception a century and a half ago. Through our schools, our democratic principles and concepts have been handed down from generation to generation, gathering strength with the years.

But every once in a while, there comes upon the scene persons or organizations which seek to pervert our system of schools and education to their own ends. You may recall the case of Jefferson Military College in Mississippi some months ago. The trustees of this small, struggling school earned the acclamation of the entire country by turning down a grant of fifty million dollars from wealthy George W. Armstrong, who offered it in return for teaching his nazi ideology of pure Aryian superiority and other false and discredited doctrines.

Unfortunately another such situation has arisen, this time in Alabama. The late Harvey G. Woodward, a wealthy former resident of Birmingham, provided in his will the sum of three million dollars for the establishment of a preparatory school for boys in the environs of Birmingham. The will creates the "Alabama Educational Foundation," and specifically names as Directors of the Board of Governors:

Ray L. Lange, Chairman
J. Parker Evans
William McM. Rogers
Theodore Swann
Keehn W. Berry
Prescott V. Kelly
Douglass W. Stockham

Directors of the Foundation are:

N. H. Batchelder, Jr.
Richard C. Crosby, of Miami University, Oxford, Ohio
Ian Stuart, of Mercersburg Academy, Mercersberg, Pa.

Except where otherwise indicated, all of these individuals reside in Birmingham. The school is to be located in Indian Springs, 15 miles from Birmingham, and it is expected that the building will begin within the next few months.

Although the will states that the purpose of the school is to build character and citizenship, specific provisions bar persons of the Jewish faith from the student body and faculty. Further, the will prohibits employment of Negroes as house or culinary servants or even in the building of the school.

The above-mentioned individuals named in the will as directors are regarded as leading citizens and of impeccable reputation. While they themselves may not share Mr. Woodward's prejudices, they have indicated that they are accepting the responsibility of carrying out the mandate of the will in establishing and administering the school.

It is our belief that these men, leaders in their professions and businesses, should not associate themselves with a project of this nature which sets such an unfortunate pattern totally alien to our democratic system of education.

Because of your deep interest and concern in strengthening our way of life, I know you will want to communicate with the above-mentioned trustees, pointing out the disservice the Woodward school will be performing to the State of Alabama and to the Nation, and calling upon them to sever their connections with this school and the discredited ideology for which it stands. I would appreciate hearing from you as to your actions in this important matter.

Sincerely yours,

Arthur J. Levin

It is directed that members of the Ethiopian or Negroid races shall not be employed as house or culinary servants or in the buildings of the school, or on the grounds, except as common laborers and then only if necessary. The Board of Governors shall provide for determining the order in which persons applying for admission shall be admitted, giving preference, however, to (1) those with English or British ancestry: (2) those best fitted; (3) those born in Alabama, in the order named.

No pupil, except those of British ancestry, shall be admitted unless his father and mother were both natural born citizens of the United States and unless such parents were of the Caucasian or white race. Each pupil shall be a natural born citizen of the United States. The Board of Governors shall determine what evidence or proof of ancestry shall be required of applicants for admission. No Jew or Hebrew, referring to his race not his religion, shall be eligible, or shall be admitted -- this is not intended as a reflection upon the people of that race or nation, but the object for which this school is founded will, in my opinion be best accomplished by designating as beneficiaries thereof the class I have hereinabove specified.

Dear George Mitchell:

The American Friends Service Committee is undertaking an educational program in economic relations. Our objective is to promote greater cooperation among various economic groups on the basis of sound ethics as well as sound economics. While much of our program will be community-centered, we shall need the association and help of informed, responsible people who may be primarily concerned with national or special aspects of economic problems.

As an economist, you have both economic and ethical views in which we are vitally interested. Therefore we are sending you the enclosed questionnaire, hoping that you will give it your critical attention and then return it as promptly as you can. (A self-addressed envelope is enclosed for your convenience.) Thank you.

On the basis of this questionnaire we hope to discover a core of ethics to which representative economists subscribe. Later we want to encourage a number of economists to exert a greater influence in our society through religious institutions and religious programs. We earnestly hope that our program will serve the ends for which you are working in your profession.

Sincerely,

Ralph W. Amerson

The Race Relations Committee staff of the American Friends Service Committee deeply appreciates your interest in Dr. Theodore Greene.

At this time, we thought you might be interested to know that he has found a placement. This placement, as we understand it, is not in keeping with his original idea of service in a Southern community with a Negro hospital. However, because of the urgency of his own situation, it was necessary for him to accept something at once. In a year or two, he will be ready to follow through on his original concern to work with a group in the South.

Again we say thank you for your help and cooperation.

Dear Mr. Anliots

We are sorry for the delay in answering this questionnaire, occasioned by Dr. Mitchell's absence from the office.

We have checked the questionnaire with a view toward what would be most useful here in the South. As you know, our difficulties are compounded here by the framework of segregation, but there has been an encouraging crumbling around the edges, particularly in the graduate schools of the border states. The recent Supreme Court decisions will help immeasurably to speed the inevitable process along.

Any information and publicity which can be spread in the South on the whole subject of discrimination in higher education will be of great help in furthering understanding, acceptance, and decent action. We will be most interested in the program your Committee decides to adopt and will be happy to offer our cooperation in whatever way you think may be helpful.

Dear Friend:

America has always been known as the "champion of the underprivileged". Why else would we have taken such a bold step as providing almost single-handedly the police force against aggression in Korea? Why else would we have intervened to help a starving and economically undernourished people shed the cloak of destitution as we have in Greece, Italy, France, England, and Belgium as well as other nations of the world? Why else would we support the French-backed government in Indo-China against guerrillas who, if successful, will subject the country and its millions of people to communistic controls which will suppress the most infinitesimal spark of individual enterprise?

The unknown factor in each case is the susceptibility of the human mind to the ideals of democracy as opposed to the militaristic aims of the communists. The individual must be educated in the American way of life. YOU, as an individual, your organization as a unit, must do the utmost to aid the underprivileged to throw off its yoke of ignorance. YOU must aid in this effort to plant the seeds of democracy in the yet unsown fields of the fertile African mind, lest the weed of communism take root.

When you have read the enclosed folder, we believe you will agree that this is a worthy cause, deserving of the most generous support.

Yours in the cause of African education,

August 1950 to March 1951

Universal peace and the brotherhood of mankind are uppermost in the minds of all citizens of the thinking world. International understanding is the ONLY road to peace. Understanding cannot obtain in the darkness of ignorance. Illiteracy on a large scale must be eliminated. This can be done only through education. The peoples of Africa have been hindered by centuries of exploitation. If they are to become an essential segment in modern civilization, they must be in a position to avail themselves of a practical and workable education. To this end the members of this movement are dedicated to the erection of an institution of higher learning in West Africa.

If West Africa is to make palpable contribution to the world and play its part effectively, much will depend upon intelligent citizenery. Trained Africans will be wanted in all fields of economic development—public works, soil conservation, irrigation, public health, child welfare, etc. In all these areas, skilled tradesmen and men with technical knowledge will be needed if West Africa is to develop into a nation.

In order to build a first class college for the peoples of West Africa, it would be necessary that the sum of $100,000 be raised from this country. Labour is cheap, the cost of building materials is comparatively low, and in order to provide a better atmosphere conducive to learning and to adequately equip the proposed college with every modern convenience which is obtainable in this country, the sum of $100,000 will be advantageously expended. Moreover the recent devaluation of the British pound increases the buying power of the American dollar.

Africa calls to YOU, champions of the underprivileged. Help her to free the minds of her children from the shackles of ignorance.

Dear Mother Agatha:

I have been carrying about for a dozen years an idea that it might be well now to try to do something with. It is a proposal that some young person be admirably trained in the science of map-making.

No American maps approach in quality the German or the British standards. Our atlases are poor. Even our Government map-making (I know nothing about the quality of army maps) is in my observation unimaginative and weak in displaying what the map sets out to cover. We simply do not have people who have mastered the art of contour coloring. Neither have we learned the German use of color in general to expound on a map. Simply put, map-making is a European skill not yet brought over to this country.

If America is poor in its maps, the South is poorer still. So far as I know, the best work is at Chapel Hill, and I think what is done there is high in the ranks of American map-making, but nothing more. Geography is coming more and more to the fore. You perhaps saw a recent survey in the New York Times that something less than five per cent of American college students are receiving any geographical training at all. The South is particularly influenced by its geography and will only understand itself when it comes to know its geography better. It won't be long before really good texts in Southern geography will be in demand. There is therefore a probable Southern future demand for a competent map-making skill, and there is always a living for the possessor of such a skill, because the government or the army could be expected to yield backlog employment. The whole continent of Africa is yet to be mapped.

Map-making is a skill which knows no barriers of color or nationality. The first American to master the skill would suffer no disabilities.

If he were a member of a minority group, he would be the more acclaimed. The Rosenwald Scholarships are gone, of course, but the John Hay Whitney Fund in New York carries on a program much like it. And the heart of both programs is an effort to finger out persons in the South who show promise in skills hitherto little possessed in the South or in this country. And provision for training abroad has been frequent with both funds.

Suggestion, therefore: that Xavier choose a likely person and push him or her for scholarship training abroad. I should think the person chosen should have shown talent in draughting and a liking for geography and history. He or she would probably have to spend two or three years abroad, so the domestic situation ought to be one that would make that feasible. Early twenties rather than late teens for age, I would think.

Clark University at Worcester, Massachusetts, has had a noble school of geography. I visited it a year ago and got the impression that its climax had passed, but I may be quite wrong. Perhaps whoever were picked ought to have a year in this country at geography and cartography before seeking work abroad. There may be some other institution than Clark which is quite good at it; I don't know.

If Xavier can turn up someone who would be suitable for such training, I would be glad to do whatever I can toward getting appropriate foundations or individuals to understand the importance of providing the training.

Sincerely,

George S. Mitchell

Dear Dr. Widenhouse:

When I was in ~~Atlanta~~ N.O. I gave you certain material on a interchurch women's organization called the "Fellowship of the Concerned." I suggested that they were in a position to do effective work in connection with ballots for Negroes in out-of-the-way rural areas, and in connection with a possible Supreme Court decision affecting segregation in the public schools.

Fortunately, we are going to have a little more time on the school thing than the prospect seemed when I talked with you. That gives us a chance to do a more thorough job. I think these women can do more to prepare the way for this than any other group in the South. They require $5,000 a year and they ought to have it for a three year period. Dr. Lawless has agreed to put up $1,000 a year on this and I am still wondering if some of your group would like to put up the additional $4,000. Here's a bargain for somebody, and its the kind of pioneering thing that I know would appeal to you.

I have waited until the summer doldrums were about over to again express my conviction as to the importance of this.

With high regards,

I am sincerely,

Dear Dr. Will:

With reference to your inquiry about Clifford Case, I have talked to a number of Members of Congress and people who know him and find the general conclusion that he is an independently-minded type of man who does not have very many close personal friends. As you know, he always voted very liberally, and is second only to Jacob Javits of New York in the number of occasions when he bucked the Republican leadership.

People who know Case say that the man who is probably closest to him, both personally and politically, is Rep. Gordon Canfield, a Republican Congressman from New Jersey who represents the district including Paterson. Among the southerners who know him the best are Brooks Hays of Arkansas, Charles B. Deane of North Carolina (Rockingham, N.C.), and Carl Elliott of Jasper, Ala. None of the last three, however, could be classified as very close personal friends.

Several Congressmen told me that Case gets along very well with Walter White of the NAACP, and respects White's opinion on most matters. This information may be more useful to you than the dope about Members of Congress.

Among the Democrats who know Case, I guess the man who knows him best in Congress from the northern group is Rep. Charles R. Howell of the Princeton district of New Jersey. Charley underlined to me the notion that Case was a man who made up his mind quite independently, has been used to having people buffet him to change his views, and hence does not change his position because somebody makes a personal plea to him. However, and this may be important for your purposes, Case is not the kind who would get up on his high horse and react against an idea just because somebody tried to present him with some strong arguments. It is worth a try.

Hope this may be of some use to you.

All the best, Ken Hechler

Dear George:

When I was in Atlanta I agreed to try to find out something about Congressman Clifford Case of New Jersey. The results are contained in the attached letter. It may or may not be of value to you. The name of Brooks Hays appears in the letter and that would be a resource we might use.

I furthermore agreed to try to enlist the interest of President Dent of Dillard University, President Johnson of Fisk University. The night I got home Dent called me from New York on another matter and I talked with him as vigorously as I knew how about the immediate necessity for making a heroic effort to get action out of the Fords on behalf of the Southern Regional Council. With this he agreed without question. He was seeing Johnson the next morning and would try to enlist Johnson's assistance along the lines of our discussion in Atlanta. He agreed furthermore that while he was in New York he would use contacts which he had to find out the status of the project and where to put pressure. I assume that he is home by now. I am writing him this afternoon to get a report which I will pass on to you when it comes.

Dear Mr. Aiken:

Our Southern Regional Council and its predecessor, the old Commission on Interracial Cooperation, chose Atlanta as the central city for improvement of race relations here in the South for the same reason that hundreds of governmental agencies and major American corporations have located in this city; its natural geographical convenience as an economic and administrative capitol of this southeastern region. All very well this centering in Atlanta for white agencies and institutions. But until you built the Waluhaje Apartments we had perforce to be apologetic and less than fully effective because the city contained, except in purely private institutions, little or no modern accomodation open to Negro travellers and to conferences built not on lines of race but on mutual interest. We rejoiced with each brick that went into Waluhaje's walls; and we have been dismayed by the legal tangle which prevents the use of such admirable facilities for conferences and transient stay.

In this new period which opens in the South, the full use of Waluhaje's facilities will be more necessary than ever. I cordially hope that your former complete hospitality and service to the city, and to the South, can be restored.

Mrs. R. C. Wallace

Dear Mrs. Wallace,

When your letter came in this morning I put in a 'phone call for you at once, but thus far into the day you've not been there, and I hasten to get this letter to you by to-night's mail.

Dismally I am promised, months ago, to be at a meeting of Methodist women (some sort of nationwide seminar) in New York August 2, 3, and 4, and that I'll have to stick to. And I'm due, though less urgently, at Montreat, N.C., for the Southern Presbyterians August 5. When I talked with Miss Daniel, at Jackson, I would certainly have said that I was away from my calendar, and subject to what might be on it, I would be delighted and honored to go out to the Convention in Sanfrancisco. But the calendar rules, and there it is.

As others to be candidates, I suggest any of three:

Marion A. Wright, Pres. of S.R.C. Lives at Linville Falls, N.C. (hardly reachable by 'phone). South Carolinian, white, lawyer who has given up practice (though by no means elderly), straight and right on all these matters, forceful speaker, eloquent.

Ben. D. Segal. Quaker, lately concerned for a year's fellowship in England to improve the relationship between British and U. S. trade unionism, and now employed by the Fund for the Republic on one of their current studies. Much Southern experience, including work for the textile workers Union (CIO) at Lynchburg, Va. Eloquent speaker, simple, direct, good. Address, Fund for the Republic, 1 East 54th St.

Fred Routh, of this office. Floridian, taught for some years at University of Miami, white, human relations expert, studied it at N.Y.U., masterful speaker, straight guy, actually doing the job of working up, with C. H. Parrish of Louisville, these new State organizations for S.R.C. Man about 30 years old.

Fred would of course go on the same terms as for GSM; expenses and some contribution to SRC. I assume Marion Wright would be the same. Segal is not connected with us, (except by marriage to a sister-in-law of our Treasurer!) and you would need to strike your own bargain with him.

My guess would be Routh, but these three and many more could well do the job.

I would have a good time going, if I could, and I am disappointed that it won't work out. We consider AKA a friend of ours, and I would like to do that pleasant trip to show it again!

Dear Dr. Mitchell:

Alpha Kappa Alpha Sorority will hold its 35th Annual Convention in San Francisco, California, August 2nd through 6th. The Public Meeting will be held the evening of August 3rd. The Executive Committee voted unanimously to extend to you an invitation to be the principal speaker on that occasion. The Theme of the meeting is "Making Ideals Realities". We were delighted to hear through Miss Lois Daniel(Director of the Southeastern Regional Conference of Alpha Kappa Alpha Sorority) at which you in Jackson, Mississippi, on Easter week-end)that you will be available to serve us at that time and that a contribution to the Southern Regional Council will constitute our financial obligation. We feel very fortunate indeed to secure your services and are grateful for the generous consideration you have given us.

Please let us hear from you at the earliest possible moment inorder that the Program may be sent to press.

Yours truly,

Dear Mr. Ezenekwe:

I am mighty sorry that I was not here when you were in Atlanta, and came to see us. I send you, separately, and with much pleasure, some pamphlets about the things we do. I also send a publications list.

I am sorry we don't have any mailing lists, but we do gladly accept subscriptions to our monthly magazine, New South, and would gladly add you to its list. But it costs $2.00.

Meanwhile, if we can ever be helpful to you by mail we would wish to.

Dear George:

A nephew of mine who is attending the Harvard Law School, sent me a copy of the "Harvard Times-Republican". You will be interested in the item entitled, "Modern Bed Time Stories".

You will also be interested to learn that a major objective of our Community Council is the promotion of good community relations within the Jewish community and in relation to the general community. This program is being carried on by our Community Relations Committee through a variety of activities.

I thought this information would be of interest to you as our paths may cross in many of these activities in cooperative endeavors.

Mr. William D. King
Chaplain
Alcorn A. & M. College
Lorman, Mississippi

Dear Mr. King:

I have some links with Alcorn myself, and I am deeply appreciative of your kind letter. Indeed, my grandfather at Jonestown managed old Governor Alcorn's plantation; and in this generation Horace Cayton and I wrote a book together, and Horace is grandson to Senator Revels. And I have been at the College, and my friend Harry Wright had a hand in paving that road.

The most we can do is take out $2.00 for your subscription to New South from your kind $5.00. By agreement with our state organizations we do not accept individual memberships from persons in the South; and merely ask our friends to join the various state organizations. But we do take subscriptions to New South directly and most gratefully. So here is $3.00 back.

Maybe you will be kind enough to join the Mississippi Council on Human Relations -- and that is its name -- which has its offices at 1104 Lynch Street, in Jackson.

Sincerely,

Dear Mr. Augustine:

We have received your letter of inquiry about Mr. Howard D. Roberts, of Daytona Beach, Florida, who has applied for the position of Industrial Field Secretary with the Akron Community Service Center, Inc.

It is our belief that Mr. Roberts would admirably fill this position. He is a well qualified and experienced professional in the field of human relations. He has been the Associate Director of our affiliate, the Florida Council on Human Relations, for the past two years. During this period, he has demonstrated his ability in the delicate field of human relations in the South by closely working with integrated groups in a score of Southern cities, by helping direct research to determine the status of local inter-group relations, and by representing the Florida Council before many lay and professional groups.

My responsibility has been of a supervisory nature with our state staff and Mr. Roberts has always demonstrated a cooperative, open-minded, constructive approach to our discussions. It is, therefore, without hesitation that I recommend him for this opening with your agency.

RECEIVED OCT 14 1957

My dear Mr. Fleming:

The last of August Mrs. Stokely drove down from Asheville to get some information on the work of Southern White Women in race relations. She said that the Southern Regional Council, I suppose she meant you, had suggested that she see me.

I let her take some material with her to study, since she could not do this during the short time she was with me. She said she would return it in three weeks or less. So, I did not ask her for her address.

This is what I want as she as neither returned the material nor has she written to me. Would you have your secretary send me her address?

I looked in the flap of the " French Broad River" for it. Only her maiden name is given and her address as Newport, Tennessee. On the other hand, she may have moved back to Asheville.

Right now it looks as though all the work of the Commission on Interracial Cooperation and the Southern Regional Council is about to go down the drain. But not to be lost forever. A drain is supposed to have an outlet and a remnant will be preserved.

Secondly, concerning your question of organizations concerned with race relations, the American Council on Race Relations determined in a study made in 1949 that 203 regional and national agencies were interested in intergroup relations. They were broken down as follows:

National:

Federal 20
Private 120

Regional:

Private 53

The National Association of Intergroup Relations Officials is now preparing a directory of intergroup relations agencies. This should be ready for distribution shortly. You can obtain a copy of this directory through Mr. Arnold Aronson, President, The National Association of Intergroup Relations Officials, 152 West 42nd Street, New York 36, New York.

Among the materials we are sending is an SRC special report, "Organizations and Personnel Engaged in Human Relations Activities in the South."

January 27, 1958

Dear Mr. Fleming:

In response to a suggestion from our mutual friend, Dr. McDowell of Wake Forest, I am writing you for some help in a particular project of mine.

Unlike my Southern Baptist colleagues, the Christian Council of this city is going ahead with its plans to offer a course on race this year. I am the teacher. For six successive Monday evenings, beginning February 10, we shall discuss the opportunities and problems suggested by the textbook by Dr. Mays, SEEKING TO BE CHRISTIAN IN RACE RELATIONS. (Springfield with a bare 7 per cent of its population Negro is probably no more courageous than Americus or Montgomery; but I'm glad the course has not been cancelled.)

I am especially hopeful that you can provide one statistic that I need. Dr. McDowell made such an excellent talk ten or twelve years ago on the factors which complicate the race question in our region, I still offer his outline to some of my audiences, and I want the up-to-date figure on the number of regional and national organizations dedicated to helping solve the problem of race in America. It was 125 or thereabouts when Dr. McDowell made his talk; it must be more now. Thank you for any information you may have on this.

Any free literature you can send will also be welcome. Any sample copies of priced materials will be put on display and recommended for personal orders. I have great regard for the Southern Regional Council and shall gladly boost its work. With sincere appreciation,

I thought you might like to have copies of our Annual Report and audited financial statement for 1958. Painful as the past year was in many ways, both the South and the Southern Regional Council made some progress. With the issue now coming to a head in our own home city, Atlanta, the coming year should be an eventful one.

It's been good to see Doug Cater back on the job and, periodically, on the Southern beat.

My very best to you and Dr. Ascoli. I hope to see you both again soon.

With appreciation and regards,

Sincerely,

Harold C. Fleming

Dear Harold:

I thank you very much for sending me the copy of the Annual Report of S.R.C. I enjoyed reading it, and rejoice in its growth & influence.

May God continue to use it richly.

Remember me cordially to Jane.

Gentlemen:

We have received today correspondence from the Department of State indicating that a letter and materials sent from this office to Mr. Dean Acheson have been passed on to your Department.

Mr. Acheson has been informed that our letter to him was inappropriately addressed and additional materials have been sent to him at a corrected address. Therefore, you may disregard the letter and materials you are holding.

Dear Mr. Acheson:

On Tuesday, February 24th there was mailed to you from this office a packet of materials on Negro registration and voting in the South. This was done at the suggestion of Mr. Harris Wofford. With the materials there was a covering letter from Mr. Harold Fleming, dictated by him, and signed in his absence.

It has come to our attention that this letter was improperly addressed. I suspect that, even with our inexcusable address, the material will reach you. If it does not, please let us know.

We deeply regret this error.

My dear Mr. Acheson:

At the suggestion of Harris Wofford, I am sending you the enclosed materials on Negro registration and voting in the South. These are materials prepared by the Southern Regional Council for general circulation. A pamphlet updating the enclosed 1957 report is in preparation and will be published in the near future.

We also have the rough data from which these reports were prepared; registration figures by county and state, case studies of selected counties, and other background information. Do call on us if we can be of help to you at any time.

Dear Mr. Alexandraki:

I am happy to write you about the qualifications of Mr. and Mrs. John Schulter as adoptive parents. I can recommend them wholeheartedly on psychological grounds. And I am sure that they would provide a financially secure home for the adopted child.

In my acquaintance with Mr. and Mrs. Schulter, I have been impressed with the breadth and quality of their interests and with the humanitarian values by which they live. I have no doubt that any child adopted by them would have the advantage of an affectionate and cultured home, a superior education and in every other way fine preparation for a fruitful life.

If there is further information which I can supply, I shall be most happy to do so.

AMERICANS FOR DEMOCRATIC ACTION

September 8, 1958

Mr. Frederick B. Routh, Assistant Director
Southern Regional Council, Inc.
Room 432, 63 Auburn Avenue, N.W.
Atlanta 3, Georgia

Dear Mr. Routh:

On Sunday, October 5th ADA in cooperation with its members in Cincinnati, Southern Ohio and Kentucky will sponsor a one-day education conference in Cincinnati devoted to issues of current concern to the general community as well as to liberals. Theodore Berry, former Vice-Mayor of Cincinnati, who is chairing the conference has asked me to invite you on their behalf to be the feature speaker on the panel dealing with civil rights.

This section will deal with two primary problems 1. the effect of the Supreme Court's decision in regard to desegregation of schools and what we can expect in the carrying out of that decision. That is the topic we would like to have you speak on. The other part of the panel will be on a problem more acute to the North, 2. segregated housing.

There is an important need for a thorough and frank discussion in Cincinnati of the race relation problem because it still retains so many characteristics of a Southern city. I am certain that you know that the Cincinnati Charter movement was destroyed and Theodore Berry defeated last year through the use of the racial problem in that community and partly as a backwash of Little Rock. Housing was selected as the other half of the civil rights issue because we in ADA are cognizant that our problems of integration in the North stem from segregated housing patterns. More and more of our ADA chapters are developing action programs in that area.

Other panels at the conference will deal with foreign and economic policy. I will be participating in the sessions as will Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., Leon Keyserling and a number of academicians and civic leaders in the Cincinnati area.

I do hope your very busy schedule will allow you to accept this invitation. We will, of course, reimburse you for the expenses involved. We in the North need to know first hand what is happening in the South, what we can expect and what we can do to further progress in desegregation of schools.

Since it is urgent that we get the announcement to the printer as soon as possible, I would appreciate your wiring your response collect to the above address.

Sincerely,

Robert R. Nathan

Mr. Ralph McGill, Editor
The Atlanta Constitution
Atlanta, Georgia

Dear Mr. McGill:

President Gould of Antioch College, at our recent Board of Directors meeting, suggested that we try to persuade you to come to our annual labor education conference in February as our dinner speaker. We hope that you will be willing to speak to the group who attend this conference on the present social and political scene, emphasizing the outstanding problems with which adult educators must deal in order to meet the challenge of the present day. The dinner meeting is scheduled for Saturday night, February 21.

Our annual labor education conference, which is held each year in New York City, is co-sponsored by the American Labor Education Service, a national labor education body, and Local 189 of the American Federation of Teachers, the members of which are engaged in labor education. The conference is attended by about 150-200 union educational directors and officers, teachers of industrial and labor relations classes, and representatives of other educational and community organizations concerned in labor and adult education. The group therefore is made up largely of professional people who are interested in using the conference for the discussion of new developments in the workers' education field and the impact of economic and technical trends on their activities.

Your talk would form the basis for our discussion in workshop sessions of such questions as how to gain a better understanding of community attitudes about the labor movement and how to develop more effective programs in workers' education. It would mean very much to us to have you as our speaker and would help stimulate us to more effective thinking throughout the whole conference. We very much hope that you will find it possible to accept our invitation.

On Sunday morning, February 22, we plan to spend the last session of our conference on a discussion of community attitudes toward organized labor and how to effect better communication with other groups in the community. It is our hope that you would find it possible to remain for the Sunday session of the conference and participate in this panel.

Mr. Harold Fleming of the Southern Regional Council, who attended this conference two years ago, has told me that, should you care to have him do so, he will be happy to interpret our program for you and give further information about us.

Thank you for giving this request your sympathetic consideration. We shall greatly appreciate your interest in our program.

Sincerely yours,

Eleanor G. Coit

Cincinnati and Communication

A hard-working committee organized the Greater Cincinnati Labor Education Conference which ALES co-sponsored, held September 6th. About 350 members of 74 local unions listened to A. J. Hayes, President, International Association of Machinists, give the keynote address, "Modern Society's Need for More Effective Communication and More Vital Community Relations." Touching on current issues in Ohio, he pointed out the need for working with all sections of the community in order to achieve labor's democratic goals. "We should be on the initiative," he said, "in demonstrating the importance of communication, not only within the labor movement but to society as a whole."

The Conference itself was an example of growing community relations for its planning committee and sponsors came from a cross-section of the merged labor groups in the Cincinnati area. Resources were drawn from union staffs, staff of AFL-CIO, and Ohio State, Xavier and Cincinnati Universities. For ALES, it was another major step ahead in the long-time program with Ohio communities. Groups all over the state have maintained and developed interests in both domestic and international issues. Conferences have become annual events, as it is expected the Cincinnati one will be, study trips have been made to the U.N. and several Ohio unionists have attended the annual ALES World Affairs School in New York.

Discussion groups had "expert" resources and gained life from the eager participation of the Conference members. Specific problems relating to the economic situation served as bases for consideration of the best ways to present labor's point of view to the community. These issues concern many people and groups and it is realized that some of them need clarification as well as exposition. Techniques of communication were discussed with faculty members, newspaper editors and union public relations officials.

James E. Fain, Executive Editor, Dayton Daily News, addressed the Conference with the conviction that "labor can, if it will, be a prime mover in creating a better nation." He emphasized that labor must think in "broad, mature, responsible terms" if it wants to put its message across and must relate its aims to those of other segments of society. "You can't expect non-members to care whether you get an extra nickel an hour unless they see you as a good social force." He also referred to the strong and vital interest labor groups have in community services.

The Conference was so successful and sparked such enthusiasm that it may well become an annual affair. The months of very skillful work by the Committee, under the chairmanship of Jim Wolfe, Director, Research and Education, International Union of United Brewery, Flour, Cereal, Soft Drink & Distillery Workers of America, were rewarding and resulted not only in the program sessions but in a very extensive amount of newspaper, radio and TV publicity. The Greater Cincinnati community showed its interest in developing the two-way street of communication and it is expected that several other cooperative projects will stem from this important beginning.

Human Rights and Freedoms

ALES held its Fifth Resident World Affairs School November 16-22. As in former years, the school was attended by trade unionists from many sections of the country and many local unions. Meeting in New York, the students followed a stiff study schedule as well as attended sessions of the United Nations General Assembly.

The chairman of the faculty of this year's School was Goodwin Watson, Professor of Education at Teachers College, Columbia University. Also teaching were persons well known to students of previous Schools, Saul Padover, Political Scientist from the New School of Social Research; Otto Klineberg, Professor of Social Psychology at Columbia University; Robert J. Blakely, Vice-President of the Fund for Adult Education; Bill Kemsley, Director of the New York office of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions; and Clark Eichelberger, Executive Director, American Association for the United Nations. George M. Harrison, Representative to the U.N. and Vice President of the AFL-CIO and representatives from other nations also discussed certain issues of human rights.

This unique opportunity for American trade unionists to spend a week working together on world issues has always been a highlight of the ALES program. Past participants have frequently expressed their gratitude for the opportunity to learn about the background of current situations and to observe the processes employed to meet them. Many of these students have contributed to local study programs on world affairs, addressing meetings, and organizing groups for study and action on specific problems.

White Collar Workers

The tremendous growth in the ranks of white collar workers in recent years, particularly among the professional and technical groups, has led to further consideration of their role in modern society. Many ideas for new educational programs and new groups to work with were discussed, and several projects have been launched in the past few months. Programs have been held in California, Massachusetts and New York to discuss basic economic questions as well as special subjects and to start a pilot study project.

Science and Technology

The Boston meetings on "Science and Technology in Modern Society" were organized with the M.I.T. Employees Union which had participated previously in summer Workshops. These technicians heard Victor Reuther, Assistant to the President, United Automobile Workers, and Al Hartnett, Secretary-Treasurer, International Union Electrical Workers, speak on "Labor Looks at Technological Progress" and "Technicians and Engineers in the American Labor Force." Discussion groups and a panel also dealt with several specific problems of technical workers in relation to the organized labor movement, procedures open to employed personnel, etc.

Gerard Piel, Editor, Scientific American, the banquet speaker, pointed out the important role scientific work has played in the development of the United States. He traced this to the interest of the Founding Fathers in science, experimentation, innovation, and their insistence on a political structure which would permit the individual freedoms necessary for discovery and development.

Simultaneously on the West Coast, 84 office workers were meeting to discuss the position of the white collar worker today. This conference brought together members of 11 local unions affiliated with the Office Employes' International Union; Street, Railway and Motor Coach Employees; American Federation of Government Employees, and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. Leaders and resource people came from these and other unions representing white collar workers.

White Collar Workshops

The annual summer workshop saw two new projects initiated. Both drew new groups into the work but met their needs in different ways. Discussions with technical and professional personnel have suggested the need for study of social attitudes of the white collar group as a whole. Although a full-fledged study is clearly outside the scope of White Collar Workshops it did seem feasible to attempt a small pilot project with a selected group of workers. A committee under Caesar Guazzo, Director of Professional, Technical and Salaried Workers, District IV, I.U.E., developed a plan to use a questionnaire among technical workers which would reveal some attitudes towards their jobs, unions, education, etc., and would also indicate a general picture of white collar workers today. Five days of the summer workshop were used to train union members to do the interviewing.

The 20 men and women from 11 local unions devoted themselves to an intensive discussion of the place of white collar workers in the general economic picture, study of interviewing techniques and consideration and revision of the questionnaire prepared by S. Michael Miller of Brooklyn College. After some practice interviewing, the project became very real and the participants were eager to start in their own groups. The main purpose is to gather a sample of attitudes among their fellow unionists. However, it is also planned to reach some non-union members, particularly those working for companies which have unions as bargaining agents. The second phase of the project is now under way. When the questionnaires have been analyzed, it is expected that there will be further meetings of the workshop members to discuss the results and experiences gained.

Social Workers and Unionists

This project was followed on the Sarah Lawrence campus by a weekend institute which brought together 29 social workers—program staff, executives, teachers of social work—and local union leaders with experience in community work. They discussed among themselves and with expert resource persons, the nature and extent of unmet problems caused by extensive lay-offs and the ways organized labor and social workers can work together to meet these problems. Joel Seidman, Chairman, Social Sciences, The College, University of Chicago, presented the economic aspects of unemployment, and Wilbur J. Cohen, Professor of Public Welfare Administration, University of Michigan, dealt with the quality of social services now available.

Discussion groups provided the opportunity for these experienced union workers and social workers to consider the unmet community needs in the light of their own extensive backgrounds. It was exciting to see the quick relationships develop and the eager participation in discussions, both formal and informal. A final panel, which included students as well as resource persons, acted out an emergency meeting of union members and social workers, called by the community council to consider ways of meeting the problems created by the closing of a major industrial plant. This session demonstrated again the readiness of people of various backgrounds to work together on community problems.

The experimental Institute proved its value so conclusively that suggestions have been made for organizing similar programs in other parts of the country. These will provide the same opportunities for professional social workers and union members to meet together in an atmosphere that results in better communication and understanding between the groups and among the individuals. It was shown that exploration of a mutual problem leads to deeper appreciation of the role each group plays in its solution and to discovery of common goals. Quick recognition of the purposes of the project helped make this summer session of White Collar Workshops an exceptionally rewarding experience for all concerned.

Teachers and World Democracy

One of the annual Winnebago County, Illinois Teachers Institutes was organized this year by the local Teachers Union in cooperation with ALES. The discussions, attended by more than 400 teachers, centered around "Contributions of American Democracy to Freedom, Prosperity and Enlightenment at Home and Abroad." A one-day Institute can touch only upon some of the major points in this broad field. However, through using visual aids, also available to teachers for the classroom, it was possible to open several lines of thought. Saul Padover, writer and historian, presented a graphic picture of the historical development of education in the United States emphasizing its dependence on the American democratic system. Haridas T. Muzumdar, Indian born sociologist now teaching at Cornell College, Iowa, followed with comments on democratic developments in newly liberated countries of Africa and Asia. A panel led by Lillian Herstein, member of ALES Board of Directors, discussed what part the United States can play in meeting the world wide demand for education.

Community Projects

The City of Chester and Environs of Delaware County, Pennsylvania, was the scene of a three months project in the spring to study the impact of unions on the community. This area was selected for an ALES pilot project because it was the second in the country to develop a union sponsored community services program. This program was so outstanding and pioneered successfully in so many areas that it won widespread respect and Chester and Environs became the first place in the country to have a labor representative on the local community chest. In recent years the county population has grown very rapidly. The time was ripe for review of both well established activities and situations which need further consideration. The fact that the local labor bodies had recently merged suggested the appropriateness of a study involving leadership from many unions.

A program committee arranged a series of meetings to discuss the general economic situation, national, state, and local; the need for community cooperation in bringing new industry to the area; the work of the Delaware County Planning Commission; needs of the public schools, and many other problems involved in urban redevelopment.

The mainspring of interest in the discussion came from the Community Services Committee and the large group of CSC Counsellors. But local union officers, education committee members, and union stewards from 24 local unions participated in the discussions and evaluation session. The study program demonstrated that trade unionists have deep interest and sense of responsibility in their community and are willing to study the increasingly complex problems facing citizens today.

ALES also cooperated with the Delaware County Steel Conference in arranging an informal series of discussions among local steelworkers. The meetings held last spring considered several political and economic problems. These included local ones related to community planning and improvement; wage and price structure, particularly that of the steel industry; and finally comparison of U.S. and U.S.S.R. productivity and technology. All the sessions provoked lively and interested participation.

Much of what was learned in the Delaware County project is proving useful in the Louisville, Kentucky program which is still in the initial stage. Marie Algor, ALES field staff, is working with the local merger committee of AFL-CIO central bodies to develop an education program on union-community relations and liberal education. The plan for about a year's study will permit broader and more intensive educational work. Louisville is a growing industrial city and provides many facilities for educational and cultural opportunities including a municipal university.

The Kentucky Federation of Teachers has asked ALES to cooperate in a workshop on December 6th. Dr. Saul Padover will be the main speaker on the challenge of "The Democratic Heritage in a Time of Crisis."

Farmers and Workers Meet

"Cooperation Through Understanding" was the theme of the seventh annual North Dakota Conference of Farmers and Workers, which ALES co-sponsored. The participants discussed the issues of prime concern to labor and agriculture in the state. They were particularly interested in exploring misconceptions each group may hold about the other, and through clarification, reaching better understanding.

Dr. Aaron H. Ihde, Associate Professor of Chemistry, University of Wisconsin, speaking on "Science and the Future," described the major scientific revolutions which have affected all human lives. All forms of work, including agriculture, have been changed by scientific and technological advances. He suggested that recent developments have led to the alternatives of wholesale destruction or plenty. If man chooses the latter, it can be achieved through cooperative efforts by all groups in society.

This Is ALES

The American Labor Education Service is a non-partisan voluntary agency supported by its members; individuals and trade unions. Believing that a free and democratic society rests upon the informed support of its citizens and their own organizations ALES develops educational programs with workers groups and provides services for local unions, and other groups interested in workers education.

Some of the recent activities are described in this Bulletin and many more are in the planning stage. Issues confronting our society today; economic development, technological change, world affairs, community structure, communication, need discussion and consideration.

At this time ALES is urging participants in its projects and all others interested in workers education to become members. This support is needed in order to continue the country-wide services.

Notes on ALES Activities

Lawrence Rogin, Director, Labor Education and Services, Institute of Labor and Industrial Relations, University of Michigan-Wayne State University and formerly Educational Director of the Textile Workers Union was elected Chairman of the ALES Board of Directors at its May meeting. The Board also expressed its deep gratitude to the retiring Chairman, Miss Lucile Kohn who has contributed her wise and discriminating services to it for twenty-five years.

ALES staff has been busy as always supplying its services in many areas and to many groups. Recent cooperative ventures include planning and participation in a two-day conference of labor and consumer groups in Asilomar, California, on "Unemployment and the Consumer."

Chester Graham, Field Associate, taught a course on "The Workers Stake in World Affairs" at the Ohio AFL-CIO Summer School, held at Ohio University.

The Director has been active as chairman of a committee planning the Labor Education Section program for the Cincinnati conference of the Adult Education Association. She also took part in the Cincinnati sessions as a member of the Board of the Council of National Organizations and as a member of the AEA Delegate Assembly.

ALES arranged for 38 members of Steelworkers Local 2323 of Chester, Pa. to spend October 18th visiting the United Nations and meeting with Indian and Swedish trade unionists.

Calendar Ahead

Duluth trade unions are planning a two-day program in cooperation with ALES to consider "Labor's Stake in World Affairs." The main topics for discussion will include consideration of world trade and the role of the United Nations in foreign relations today These meetings are scheduled for January 24 and 25, 1959.

The role of science and technology in modern life will be the subject of the annual Cleveland Conference sponsored in 1959 by the Cleveland labor movement and ALES. The sessions will be held at the Carter Hotel on February 7 and 8.

The annual Washington's Birthday Conference of teachers and leaders in workers education will take place in New York City February 21 and 22. The impact of economic and social trends on various fields of study will be discussed as well as new approaches to educational work.

Foreign Visitors

Trade unionists continue to arrive from all parts of the world to study various aspects of the American labor movement and life. ALES sees many of these, particularly those interested in workers education. Some are met briefly by members of the staff while others turn to ALES for more extensive aid in planning itineraries, arranging introductions, etc. Several recent visitors have taken part in ALES programs such as the Cincinnati Conference attended by Miss Ragnhild Eriksen, Member of the Oslo City Council and Executive Committee of the Oslo Labor Party, and Mr. Brij Sekhri, President, Road and Building Workers Union, Delhi, India. Mr. Sekhri also went to the North Dakota Farmer-Worker Conference.

Miss Ebba Gullmar, Member of the Women's Council of the Swedish Confederation of Trade Unions made a six weeks trip throughout the United States arranged by ALES. Her schedule was developed in order to give time for observation and consultation in fields of special interest: workers education, women in industry and reading facilities for children. ALES takes this opportunity to thank the many people in New York, Chicago, Minneapolis, San Francisco, Boston and Washington who assisted Miss Gullmar in this study project.

In the spring, the staff was pleased to entertain a team of European trade unionists brought to the United States under the auspices of the European Productivity Agency and the U.S. Department of Labor. Other visitors who have consulted ALES about their work came from the West Indies, England, Norway, Denmark, Austria, Philippines, French West Africa.

Focus on the U.N.

The first issue of the newest ALES publication, "Focus on the U.N.—Study Notes for Workers," was received with great enthusiasm last spring. This periodical is designed to assist workers' study groups interested in the United Nations by presenting brief summaries of some of the crucial issues before the international organization and other intergovernmental agencies. In addition, selected bibliography related to these issues is included. The second "Focus on the U.N." has been released. This deals with some of the items on the agenda of the General Assembly, including disarmament, control of space, atomic radiation, etc. "Focus" is available from ALES free of charge for up to five copies. In quantity, there is a charge to cover printing costs.

Dear Mrs. Adair:

Please accept my apologies for this delay in replying to your letter dated July 1.

We are well informed about the good work that has been done in Norfolk, and the financial needs that exist there. As you may know, Paul Rilling has just left the directorship of the Virginia Council on Human Relations to join our staff, and we have also been in communication with the Rev. James Brewer.

In order to simplify matters, we have asked Mr. Brewer to call you and pass along the gist of our recent exchanges of correspondence with him.

With every good wish, I am

Director
Southern Regional Council

Dear Sir:

My husband and I are active members of the Norfolk Committee for Public Schools and at a recent Washington Seminar on Public Affairs of the YWCA I met Mr. Frederick Routh.

After his presentation of integration, I talked with him about the struggle the Committee was having in paying the lawyers for our case. We raise the initial amount quite quickly and successfully (about $8500.) But then both cases(against Governor and against City Council) were appealed. We need approximately $5,000 more. Mr. Routh said that he might have some possible leads of people or groups who might be receptive to a plea for help. I gave him the name of the current president, Dr. Forrest P. White. However, Dr. White informs me he has not heard from Mr. Routh.

I noticed in a news account recently that Mr. Routh was changing positions and leaving the Southern Regional Council. I feel this accounts for the fact that we have not heard from him. Is it possible that you could help us out?

We do feel that when we tested the Massive Resistance laws and the closing of public schools that we found an answer for more than just Norfolk. That we saved other communities from this battle. Maybe, some would agree and help us out financially if they knew we really needed it. I am enclosing a newspaper clipping about the recent decision in regard to the appeal. ~~The City Council finally have dropped their appeal.~~ The State finally dropped their appeal to Supreme Court

Thank you for considering this matter and if Mr. Routh is still at the office extend our best wishes to him as he ventures north.

Sincerely yours,

Margaret Adair

Appeals Court Backs Norfolk Injunction

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Says Council Cannot Halt School Funds

RICHMOND (AP)—The U.S. 4th Circuit Court of Appeals today upheld District Judge Walter E. Hoffman's order restraining the Norfolk City Council from withholding public school funds to avoid integration.

In a 15-page opinion written by Circuit Judge Morris A. Soper, the appeals court said it understood Hoffman's injunction was not a final adjudication, but "rather an order passed in an emergency to preserve the right of the plaintiffs to a public school education.

The court added:

"But in order that there may be no misunderstanding on this point and no interference with the rights and duties of the City Council in the execution of its powers, the judgment of the District Court will be affirmed and the case remanded for further proceedings, with direction to the court to retain jurisdiction of the case with leave to any party at any time to move for modification of the terms of the injunction."

The suit was instituted last Jan. 15 by a number of white children and their parents to prevent the closing of certain grades in Norfolk's public schools, which would have deprived more than 17,000 pupils of public education.

The complaint charged the City Council was engaged in an evasive scheme to nullify orders issued by the District Court or to be issued in a pending suit instituted in October, 1958. In that suit, some of the same plaintiffs challenged the constitutionality of some of Virginia's massive resistance school laws.

The suit against the City Council was heard on Jan. 26, shortly after the Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals knocked down the state's package of massive resistance laws. On the same day the state court acted, Hoffman announced the decision of a three-judge court in the other Norfolk suit, holding the state closure law unconstitutional.

All the pupils involved in the City Council suit were entited to enrollment in the schools to which they sought admission if the schools had been in operation. Three senior and three junior high schools had been closed in September, 1958, under the state school closure law.

On Nov. 25, City Council passed an ordinance providing that the appropriation for schools was made on a tentative basis and no part of funds appropriated would be available to the school board except as the City Council from time to time might authorize by resolution.

On Jan. 13, City Council adopted a resolution designed to close certain additional schools. This action led to the filing of the uit.

Appeals Court Backs Injunction

In this connection, the court cited the decision of the U.S. 5th Circuit Court of Appeals in a case where a Negro teacher in Georgia sought a declaratory judgment and an injunction against Atlanta school officials prohibiting them from a salary discrimination aimed at Negro teachers.

"It was there held that the suit was not, either in name or in effect, a suit against the state of Georgia, forbidden by the 11th amendment," the 4th Circuit Court noted.

The appeals court said the district court was justified in its conclusion that the City Council action was taken as part of the plan of massive resistance adopted b ythe State Legislature in 1956 to retain public school segregation.

"A glaring inconsistency is manifest between the earlier action of City Council and that which was taken later when it became apparent that the plan of massive resistance had failed," said the appeals court.

It noted that on Sept. 30, 1958 City Council had declared that "it was necessary for the immeditae preservation of the public peace, property, health and safety of the city to provide for the daily operation of the public schools and that for this purpose the closed high schools should be immediately opened and operated, pursuant to the acts of the General Assembly.

"But on Jan. 13, 1959, when the decisions of the (state and federal) courts . . . were imminent, the City Council declared that it was necessary for the immediate preservation of the public peace, property, health and safety that all of the schools higher than the sixth grade be closed and that none of the funds appropriated therefore should be used for their maintenance and operation.

"The only reasonable explanation for this change of view is that the City Council, realizing that the general plan of massive resistance had failed, took steps to avail itself of the authority conferred by Section 22-127.1 of the Code to withdraw the appropriation it had already made and thus accomplish at least a part of the original plan."

The appeals court noted the council contended its action was not to evade constitutional prohibitions against segregation, but was taken because of serious doubts as to the extent to which the state's financial support of schools would be curtailed and in the genuine belief serious disorders would occur if the races were mixed in the schools.

"This testimony, however, is largely offset by the city's assumption of all the contractual obligations of the school board, which comprised 92 per cent of the total costs of operation, with the result that although all of the grades above the sixth would be closed, the teachers would continue to draw their salaries," the appeals court said.

"The excuse that the upper grades were closed in order to avoid violence and disorder is also frail, in view of the fact that desegregation of the lower grades was not contemplated. In any event, the excuse cannot prevail over the established rule that the preservation of the public peace cannot be used to justify the violation of constitutional rights . . . We are of the opinion that the judge's finding as to the purpose and effect of the ordinance was sustained by the evidence."

The appeals court disagreed with City Council's contention its action was a valid exercise of power to control the appropriation and expenditure of school funds.

Council did not confine itself said the court, "to the area of its discretionary power over appropriations. It went further and invaded the domain of the school board and attempted to exercise the power to operate the schools vested in the school authorities by the State Constitution when it took steps to bring about the closing of all school grades above the sixth in the city school system."

Noting the Virginia Supreme Court's holding that the General Assembly could not establish a school system divesting the local school authorities of power and control over local schools and placing such authority in the Governor and State Board of Education, the appeals court added:

"Much less can the City Council of Norfolk, notwithstanding its control of the purse, arrogate to itself the power to operate the public schools of the city."

The appeals court opinion covered at length the steps leading up to the suit.

"The present case falls within the class of cases where a public officer or agent makes use of his authority to perform an illegal act by involving the command of an unconstitutional statute or seeks to carry out a valid statute in an unconstitutional manner," said the court.

"In such cases, it is held that his action is not the act of the state but the act of an individual, which may be restrained by the injunctive power of the federal court."

Dear Mr. Adams:

Harold Fleming has asked this office to send you various materials on the progress of desegregation and the betterment of the Negro's economic and social position in the South. We are forwarding under separate cover:

1. A report, The Negro Voter in the South. Another report will be released early next month, and your name has been added to our distribution list.

2. The latest population figures we have - county by county, and in some instances for major cities - for the following states: Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina and Tennessee. We are able to furnish only state totals for Arkansas, Texas, Virginia and South Carolina. These are:

   Arkansas, 1950
   Total: 1,909,511; white 1,481,507; Negro 428,004
   (U. S. Census, 1950 - latest data in this office)

   Total: 3,799,174; white 2,981,893; Negro 817,281
   (Bureau of Population and Economic Research, University of Virginia.)

   Texas, 1956
   Total: 8,925,000; white 7,791,456; Negro 1,133,544
   (State of Texas Dept. of Health)

Total: 2,415,502; White 1,461,385; Nonwhite 954,117

3. Our most recently compiled listings of Negro office-holders and candidates for public office; a listing of desegregating colleges and universities.

4. A Health Information Foundation Report on "The Health of the Nonwhite Population." (For more detailed information you may wish to contact the U. S. Department of Public Health or the various state public health agencies.)

5. State by state comparisons of median per capita income and educational attainment, white and Negro (or, in the instance of education, nonwhite) - all 1950 census figures, unfortunately.

6. Several other printed and mimeographed reports we have here: "What the Supreme Court Said," "A Background Report on School Desegregation for 1959-60," and "The Southern Negro: Change and Paradox."

We are sorry not to be able to furnish information on several of the other topics which were of interest to you.

Sincerely,

New York 11, New York

Dear Mrs. Abrams:

This is to thank you most warmly for your letter and to ask your pardon for this late answer, occasioned by a combination of illness and travel.

I am familiar enough with the racial situation in Northern cities to understand your feelings of frustration. It is one of our big problems in the South, I think, that the rest of the nation cannot approach our problems with more moral authority, because of the discriminations practiced there.

There are a good many organizations in New York that are actively concerned with the various phases of racial discrimination and segregation -- in housing, education, employment, and so on. I should think you would find it rewarding to learn more about such agencies and perhaps to become actively involved with one or more of them. Let me suggest, as a beginning, that you get in touch with the National Association of Intergroup Relations Officials (NAIRO), at 426 West 58th Street, Room 209, New York 19. NAIRO maintains a complete listing of intergroup relations organizations and would be glad, I am sure, to refer you to the principal ones in the New York area. In this way, at least you will find others who share your concern.

With every good wish, I am

Sincerely,

My dear Mr. Fleming —

I have just read your article in the magazine section of the New York Times — It prompts me to write to you, first to thank you for the article which I think is very fine —

I was born and reared in Savannah and lived part of my adult life in Brunswick (also Georgia) and have lived here about fourteen years —

During that time I have wanted to do something more effective than I've been able to do — I meet, with opposition, the smug attitude of New Yorkers about "the negro problem in the south" as they like to refer to it — and until my recently they would not admit that there is violent prejudice here — yet at two luncheon meetings that I have been invited to, a negro at each meeting brought out into the light the jim crowism they had encountered in the housing situation — At one of these meetings

I discussed with a negro woman the way school children have to face being ostracized when they enter high school - She said that is one of the cruelest situations that they have to handle - I could go on and on - In fact, I've collected a number of stories that bring out the point that I want to make - That the camouflage behind which negroes here are deprived of their rights is appalling - Legally I'm sure the white citizenry is in his rights but were he not so protected, there would be little difference in what goes on here and there - And what I so fervently wish is that some one would devote time and much of it, to impress upon the country that this is not a localized situation, that it exists here just as it exists there - in one case it is all a mishandled situation in the south, here we treat them as they should be treated. I'd like to write to the man who posed as a negro during a lantern trip and urge him to repeat the performance in the North and see if the identical thing would not

Laffen - I do not know where to reach him or I think I'd write to him tonight - I am just cross enough to do it -
Recently I contemplated moving from where I now live and friends who heard where I intended moving to would say "oh don't go to that neighborhood - negroes are invading it as fast as they can wedge in and when one or two families manage it, the neighborhood is ruined" - and so on far into the night - But if you know anyone who would sympathetically understand and work on my phase of the problem, I'd be most appreciative if you would suggest it to me.

Sincerely
Irene P. Abrams

Dear Mr. Fleming:

I have just talked with Jack Greenberg at the Legal Defense and Education Fund concerning information on the student strikes in the South. I am collecting information about the extent of the situation: the number of students involved; the number of arrests; the amount of money needed; and other such information.

I am told that while there is no central source of such information, your organization has been putting out some reports in this regard and Jack suggested that I write you requesting what you have.

I will appreciate any information that you can send on to me.

TO: THOSE WHO HAVE BEEN CONCERNED AND HELPFUL
IN MY SEARCH FOR A NEW EMPLOYMENT CHALLENGE.

It is with real joy that I can announce that the Mayor of Kansas City, Missouri (His Honor H. Roe Bartle) has this day appointed me to fill the position of Executive Secretary of the municipal Commission on Human Relations, effective July 5, 1960.

I have submitted my resignations from the triple-pastorate in which I am now engaged, effective June 30, 1960, at which time we shall move to Kansas City.

May I express my sincere appreciation for the countless help which you have given during the past six months? I wish you well in your work, and hope that you might have occasion to visit us in our new home...the address of which is not as yet known. Letters addressed to the Commission Office in CityHall will be promptly delivered.

If I can be of assistance to you in any way, I hope that you will write or telephone so that I might return in kind the help which you have so graciously given me.

Sincerely,

Dear Mrs. Adair:

My apologies for not having written before, but I have been out of the office almost constantly since we met at Blue Ridge.

Here are a few names of persons whom you and your associates might want to consider as possible speakers:

Morris Abram, attorney, Healey Building, Atlanta. Chairman of the Mayor's Crime Commission, former candidate for Congress, member of the Atlanta Community Planning Council, board member of two large national foundations. A Rhodes Scholar, on the prosecutor's staff at the Nuremberg trials, and a native Georgia, Morris is deeply informed about race relations and is a brilliant speaker.

James McBride Dabbs, Mayesville, S. C. President of the Southern Regional Council, planter and writer, author of The Southern Heritage. In appearance, speech, and manner -- everything but racial views -- Dabbs is the very model of a Southern gentleman. He is a delightful and disarming speaker.

Marion A. Wright, retired attorney, Linville Falls, N. C. Past president, now vice-president, of the Southern Regional Council; a very eloquent and effective speaker, deeply informed about race relations. Mr. Wright takes a very strong and principled position on racial questions, and presents it with great skill.

Kenneth Morland, professor of sociology, Raldolph-Macon Woman's College, Lynchburg, Virginia. Morland is a sensitive student of the South, has been active in the Virginia Council on Human Relations, and has carried out race relations studies in South Carolina and Texas, as well as Virginia. He is one of those rare and useful people who bridge the gap between academic and action spheres. Teaching this summer at the University of Georgia.

I hope these suggestions will be of some help.

Dear Mrs. Attaway:

I hope you will forgive my delay in answering your letter of October 5. I have been in California a week and returned to the office just today.

We are indeed anxious to be of service in connection with your important Community Understanding Conference. I have taken the liberty of consulting Mr. Dan Bowers, director of the Virginia Council on Human Relations, who works closely with us and is well informed concerning speakers in the state of Virginia.

We passed on a number of suggestions to Mr. Bowers and he has agreed to get in touch with you by telephone concerning the matter. I believe that Mr. Bowers, being in Virginia, can work with you more closely than we can from Atlanta. Needless to say, you should feel free to call on us again if you and Mr. Bowers are unable to solve the problem.

Dear Mr. Fleming:

Help! We need your help.

You may recall that Margaret Adair talked with you once during the past summer regarding the Community Understanding Conference begun here in 1957 and held annually since then. (I think she saw you at a YWCW Conference.) To review it briefly for you, however, will enable you to understand the assistance we need.

These conferences are an attempt on the part of the sponsoring organizations,

Norfolk Council of Church Women (Protestant)
Tidewater Deanery of Catholic Women
Norfolk and Phyllis Blackman Chapters of B'nai B'rith
Young Women's Christian Association
Unitarian Women's Alliance,

to stand publicly united on the importance of the need for human understanding. In a sense, the program each year has been an exploration of some facet of prejudice.

Former speakers are Grillett Simpson, Chancellor of Mary Washington College in Virginia; Dr. Kenneth Haddock, Virginia State Senator of Richmond; and Dr. Thomas Pettigrew, Harvard Professor.

The 1960 conference will be held at the YWCA from 9:30 A.M. to 12:30 P.M. on December 9th. We have already secured a Panel of Americans group from New York to participate in the program. I am sure you are familiar with these panels operating out of about 25 colleges and universities.

But to round out our 1960 program, we wish to present an outstanding Southern personality, one who has the outlook of a sociologist. His task on the program would be to laud the heritage that is ours as Americans, and then to softly tie that heritage to the challenge raised by the panel.

We have already asked, and been necessarily refused by, the following: Dr. Kenneth Morland, Colgate W. Darden, Ralph McGill, William B. Hartsfield, and Morris Abrahms. Each was interested in our conference, but unable to make the date of Friday, December 9th.

Can you do anything immediate to help us? This speakers expenses will be paid by us through the registration fees paid by those attending ---- approximately two hundred people. There are no other funds behind this community effort, but we think it is enough akin to the purposes of your SRC that you will want to help us, not financially, just to "nail down" a speaker who can come. We will welcome any questions from you, and we will be most indebted to you for any help you can give. Feel free to call me collect at my home after 5 P.M., if you can speed up things thereby. The number is MADISON 5-1868.

Sincerely yours,

ANNOUNCEMENT OF NEW GRANT

I take pleasure in announcing the receipt of a $300,000 grant from the fund for Adult Education. This grant is given to the AFCE to enable it to function during the next five and a half years as a center of information about liberal education for adults through study-discussion and as a center for promotional help and leadership training. The Foundation will continue to develop its own discussion materials and make them available to the field.

In addition, in order to provide one central place of information, the Fund is turning over to the AFCE the rights to those study-discussion programs which have been developed for or by the Fund during the past decade. Many of these programs have been or shortly will be published by various commercial publishers. The Foundation intends to issue regular newsletters containing the latest information about all aspects of study-discussion, including up-to-date information on the availability of programs from commercial publishers, universities and all other sources. Enclosed is a copy of the most recent News Digest distributed by the Fund for Adult Education which explains the current status and availability of those study-discussion programs in general use.

The AFCE will continue its present activities of preparing and conducting special programs of liberal arts and politics for business, trade union and national organization groups, and governmental agencies, of preparing materials in the new science series and of assisting organizations and agencies of all kinds with leadership training and promotion.

We look forward to a continuing association with those sponsoring institutions and organizations, private groups and discussion leaders with whom we have been working since 1947. We will welcome your comments and suggestions on any and all aspects of our work.

$300,000 FUND GRANT TO THE AMERICAN FOUNDATION FOR CONTINUING EDUCATION. The American Foundation for Continuing Education, 19 South La Salle Street, Chicago 3, Illinois, has received a grant of $300,000 from The Fund for Adult Education, to enable it to function as a national center to advance the liberal education of adults through study-discussion groups. This represents a total of one and one-half million dollars thus far given the Foundation by The Fund for Adult Education over the past nine years. In addition, the Fund will transfer to the Foundation ownership of certain contractual rights in published and other study-discussion programs developed by the Fund.

In announcing the grant, C. Scott Fletcher, President of The Fund for Adult Education, said that a decade of intensive experimentation had demonstrated that study-discussion programs for adults led by trained lay leaders was one of the most effective ways by which high-quality learning experiences could be offered to large numbers of adults by educational institutions and organizations. Study-discussion, which consists of small groups studying specially prepared or selected materials under carefully trained lay leadership, has not only proved its worth as a method of learning, he said, but it has been shown to be uniquely adapted to the needs of American society because it develops and sharpens the skills that are essential to self-government.

Effective January 1, 1961, as a result of this grant, the American Foundation for Continuing Education will assume all responsibility for all study-discussion in the liberal arts activities heretofore carried on by The Fund for Adult Education. Furthermore, as of this date, the Foundation will act as a clearinghouse on all aspects of study-discussion, and particularly on the current status of program materials developed by the Fund and others over the past years.

The grant, to cover a period of five years, will be used to enable the Foundation to expand development of its own study-discussion programs, to aid in the training of discussion leaders, to advise institutions of higher education, organizations, professional, civic and membership associations of all kinds, and governmental agencies on the creation of study-discussion programs, and, in general, through research and experimentation, to promote a better understanding of the value and use of study-discussion nationally.

The American Foundation for Continuing Education was founded in 1947 to "promote the continuing education of adults in those fundamental ideas that influenced the nature of American society and that determined the quality of our lives as individuals, as citizens, and as productive members of the economy." During the past three years the Foundation has worked closely with business, labor and government to develop programs that will help prepare executives for positions involving broad social responsibilities.

STATUS OF CURRENT PROGRAMS

As our readers already know, the Fund has been making arrangements with publishers for the commercial publication of many of its programs to insure their permanent availability and their widespread distribution. At the present time there are three programs available from commercial publishers:

AGING IN TODAY'S SOCIETY. Prentice-Hall, Inc., Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey. Prepared under the direction of Clark Tibbitts and Wilma Donahue; edited by John Walker Powell. $6.00 per copy.

OUR COMMUNITY. New York University Press, 32 Washington Square, New York. Edited by Dorothy and Curtis Mial. $5.00 per copy.

EXPLORING THE WAYS OF MANKIND. "Adult Education Edition." Holt, Rinehart and Winston, Inc., 383 Madison Avenue, New York 17, New York. Edited by Walter Goldschmidt. $4.75 per copy.

All the publishers will allow a 20% discount on orders for ten or more copies, provided it is indicated on the order that the copies are for adult study groups.

The American Foundation for Continuing Education will distribute the Fund programs in addition to its own Case Studies. Materials formerly available from the Foundation and now published and distributed by Oxford University Press, 417 Fifth Avenue, New York, are:

READINGS IN WORLD POLITICS - $2.25
READINGS IN AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY - $2.75
READINGS IN RUSSIAN FOREIGN POLICY - $2.75
READINGS IN AMERICAN DEMOCRACY - $2.25

ECONOMICS AND POLITICS will be published by Oxford, probably in March.

Fund for Adult Education programs now to be obtained from the American Foundation for Continuing Education are:

GREAT ISSUES IN AMERICAN POLITICS. Basic Text and Suggestions for Discussion, Set: $2.75.

AN INTRODUCTION TO THE HUMANITIES (until the publication of AVENUES TO THE ARTS). Basic Text and Book of Readings (1 volume) and Painting and Architecture Supplement, Set: $3.50. Guide for Discussion Leaders, $1.00.

JEFFERSON AND OUR TIMES. Basic Text and The Jeffersonian Heritage, Set: $2.75.

LEADING GROUP DISCUSSION. Basic Text and Supplementary Readings, with Suggestions for Leaders, Set: $2.00.

LOOKING AT MODERN PAINTING (until the publication of the commercial edition by W. W. Norton and Company). Basic Text and Suggestions for Discussion, Set: $4.50. Discussion Leader's Guide, $1.00.

PARENTHOOD IN A FREE NATION (until published commercially). Basic Text: Manual for Participants and Leaders and Basic Readings, Set: $2.75.
Middle Childhood Course, $2.00 each.
Later Childhood Course, $2.00 each.
Adolescence Course, $2.25 each.
Supplementary Readings, $6.50 per set.

POWER TO GOVERN. Basic Text, $2.50 each. Notes for Discussion Leaders, $1.00.

TRANSITION AND TENSION IN SOUTHEAST ASIA. Basic Text, $2.50 each. Discussion Leader's Guide, $1.00. Wall Map of Southeast Asia, $1.00.

WAYS TO JUSTICE, Basic Text, $2.00 each.

A 20% discount will be allowed on orders for ten or more copies.

The audio-visual materials designed to accompany the Fund's discussion materials are distributed solely by the Audio-Visual Center, Indiana University, Bloomington, Indiana. They include the following:

AGING IN TODAY'S SOCIETY - 10-inch record; "The Many Lives of J.Q.P." 10-min. kinescope; "Aging-Modern Social Achievement" - color film. "The New Prime of Life" - 10-min. kinescope.

DISCOVERING MODERN POETRY - Album of two 12-inch recordings.

EXPLORING THE WAYS OF MANKIND - Album of 10 recordings with questions for discussion.

GREAT ISSUES IN AMERICAN POLITICS - Film (25-min. 16mm. - "The State and the Nation."

AN INTRODUCTION TO THE HUMANITIES - Album of two 12-inch home study records; One 10-inch record for discussion.

JEFFERSON AND OUR TIMES - Album of five records.

LOOKING AT MODERN PAINTING - Set of 46 slides (mostly color) of significant modern paintings.

OUR COMMUNITY - Album of two records; Film (25-min. 16mm) - "Three Steps to Start."; Four Filmstrips.

THE POWER TO GOVERN - One 12-inch recording.

WAYS TO JUSTICE - Album of three records.

We are pleased that the American Foundation for Continuing Education will assume responsibilities the Fund has borne in the past for study-discussion, and we are confident the Foundation will enjoy, as we have, an association with you in what we believe to be one of the most important ventures in adult education.

Dear Mr. Goldberg:

Some time ago we heard a rumor that a prospective tenant was offered space at 5 Forsyth Street on the condition that they use the bath rooms located within our space on the second floor. We were pleased that no one approached us on the matter and preferred to think that, naturally, we did not figure into any considerations between prospective tenants and Allan-Grayson.

Today, however, we have been called by a news reporter to determine the "nature" of our rest rooms and whether or not anyone had refused to share such facilities with us. We informed him that the Council selected space which had facilities within its own area. This was done, we stated, because our staff was sufficiently large to justify such an arrangement and because we specifically did not want this problem to arise. By mutual consent a clause to this effect was inserted in our lease.

We assume that your interpretation of this situation is the same as ours. Certainly, we are aware of the factors that had to be taken into consideration at the time this arrangement was made, and we are both grateful and pleased that such a satisfactory arrangement was possible.

I am sure you can understand our reluctance to be placed in a position of having to allow or refuse others the use of facilities which we went to some lengths to acquire to avoid any difficulties. And, of course, we are very anxious that the Council not figure in any publicity or debate which others may choose to have.

Last week I had a chat with Whitney Young, seeking his advice on some problems we are having with conference planning. He suggested that I get in touch with you.

Very briefly, we are a national organization of older persons, and have a total membership of over half a million. We have nine geographic areas and are starting a program, in 1963, of having a conference in each area in each odd numbered year. We want to schedule these conferences in cities where an open policy is in effect with reference to our Negro members.

Whitney says you have compiled a list of such cities, and of specific hotels, where such a policy applies. Would it be possible for you to send us such a list?

Thank you for your cooperation.

For your purposes I suspect you will probably find the following cities best suited if they coincide with your area needs: Miami Beach, Florida; Louisville, Kentucky; Oklahoma City and Tulsa, Oklahoma; Gatlinburg, Tennessee; Houston, Texas; Richmond and Williamsburg, Virginia.

Dear Mr. Anthony:

I am working on a paper to present to a group of teachers at the Maryland State Teachers Convention in Baltimore in October and find myself in need of some statistics.

I am wondering if the Southern Regional Council has in its files any figures on the number of Negro children expected in white schools this coming year; and also what portion of the Negro school-age population does this represent? This may sound rather vague but I am trying to get one statement to show where we stand now in numbers in proportion to what is to be done.

If you do not have this information at your fingertips, please don't bother about it; but it just occurred to me that you might have it.

A STATEMENT FROM THE ALBANY MINISTERIAL ASSOCIATION

Whereas, the Albany Ministerial Association remains sensitive to the continuing problems in the realm of human relationships and is conscious of its responsibility to provide leadership in this realm,

Therefore, Be it resolved that the Albany Ministerial Association set forth the following Christian Principles and Propositions for consideration, and for concerted action by the citizens of our community.

1. CHRISTIAN PRINCIPLES

   The Word of God, which the church confesses and which we proclaim, reveals the judgement of God upon sinful man, and sets forth the power of the love of God to redeem him. God, the Creator and Ruler of all mankind has placed us in community. Racial strife, intimidation of citizens and such acts as the burning of churches are evidences of a community's torn fabric and moral sickness. In these circumstances the people of God must penitently seek to know and to follow His will, trusting in the power of His love to redeem sinful men and to reconcile broken relationships.

2. PROPOSITIONS FOR ACTION

   In the light of these concepts of God and man, certain propositions are appropriate for us and for people of all races, at this time.

   (a) Acknowledge Our Sins;

   We must begin where we are in repentance, seeking redirection and renewal of heart and mind by God. Discord and hardship resulting from racial and cultural practices must be faced before God. The unacknowledged sins of pride, prejudice, fear, jealousy, hatred and enmity have added a great moral peril to our present situation. Unreasonable demands and unwillingness to cooperate have created unholy causes and crisis.

(b) Accept Our Responsibility:

Each one must realize his responsibility to God for his actions which affect the community. Each must examine his words and deeds in the light of God's commands. As citizens and as officials, we share in the obligation to make our laws and practices conform to our Father's will, taking into consideration the needs and the abilities of each part of our society. Authorities are due respect and support from the people, while the people are due constructive leadership and planning from the authorities. While change is always necessary in creating a better and more perfect social order, such change must be sought through the orderly processes of law.

(c) Open Avenues of Communication:

The great tragedy of our present situation is that there is no real discussion of the issues involved except within separated racial groups. In these circumstances it is inevitable that misunderstandings will continue and that suspicion and distrust will increase. We believe that it is imperative that both races have a willingness to discuss our problems across racial lines, and to understand each other's positions. We believe that only the truth should be made known to the people of our community. It is only as we approach our problems in the spirit of mutual respect, of charity, and of good will that we can hope to understand one another, and to find God's solution of our problems. It is appropriate, therefore, that we each approach this task in a spirit of humility, of penitence and of prayer. Therefore, it is necessary again that the people of this community be called to pray earnestly and constantly that God will give us wisdom to understand.

(I am writing an article on the South and the 1964 election. I will appreciate your cooperation in filling out the questionnaire. A stamped, addressed envelope is enclosed. If you do not want to be quoted, say so at the end of the questionnaire. If you would like a summary of my findings, also make such a request at the end of the questionnaire. I will be interested in any comments you may have on Southern politics. This questionnaire has been sent to Southern office holders, newsmen and others who can speak with authority on Southern politics.)

1. Do you think Kennedy will win in the South in 1964? Why?

2. How long do you think it will be before you have two-party politics in your home state?

3. Do you think Goldwater can sway Southern Democrats to vote Republican, as a candidate, or as a campaigner?

4. What part does the Negro vote play in state-wide elections in your state?

5. To what do you attribute the Republican gains in the South? In your home state?

6. What can a candidate do, in your opinion, to become more popular in the South?

7. Will you campaign for a presidential candidate? If so, whom?

8. Do you think that primary emphasis on race issue in South has produced a harmful effect on national politics?

9. Do you think the South could decide the 1964 presidential election? Can you elaborate?

10. I would like any other comments you may have on 1964 campaign.

My dear Mayor Allen:

Thank you for your letter of October 9. I sent you, last week, a copy of a letter I had written to Mr. Walter Crawford. As reported in it, we were able to make arrangements at Howard Johnson's South, and will have our meeting in Atlanta. This was a happy outcome, but still a small step.

With very best wishes,

Dear Mr. Lawton:

Thank you for your letter of March 26. We are greatly in your debt for both your present and proposed programs in the South. My first reaction to all of the programs suggested in your letter is that they are valuable indeed.

I would hope that we would have a chance, however, to discuss these things with you. And here we confront the seemingly inevitable problems of schedule. I doubt that I shall be in Atlanta when you are here on April 16 and 17. I believe, however, that something may still be worked out.

I shall be going to New York next week; arriving Sunday night, April 12, and staying on most or perhaps all of the week. Paul Anthony, who is our Director of Field Activities, whom I would certainly want you to see anyhow, will be here, and will be free on the morning of the 16th. During the afternoon of the 16th and the morning of the 17th the Southern Interagency Conference will be having its quarterly meeting, using our conference room. You might find this an interesting meeting to attend, and I am sure the representatives of the other agencies, which include practically all those doing human relations and civil rights work in the South, would be pleased to have you present.

The possibilities then seem to be several: if you are in New York earlier in the week perhaps you and I could get together there; I shall be staying at the Park Sheraton Hotel. I may be back in Atlanta while you are here. Paul Anthony will be here until noon on the 17th when he leaves for Washington.

With all best wishes,

Sincerely yours,

Dear Mr. Dunbar:

As Leader-at-large for the American Ethical Union I am engaged in some of the field work for our Commission on Race and Equality. I was in your office a year ago and talked to one or two of your staff members but was unable to spend any time with you because you had a crowded calendar. I plan to be in Atlanta April 16th and 17th and am hoping that you will be available on one of those two days for an appointment.

16th AM

We are contemplating projects in the South during the coming months and it has occurred to me that there may be some way we could assist with the work of the Southern Regional Council. I have been a subscriber to "New South" for several years and am a friend of Dr. James McBride Dabbs. Atlanta was originally my home town. The American Ethical Union underwrote the expenses of the joint conference of the Georgia Council on Human Relations and the Alabama Council on Human Relations held last October 4th and 5th at Tuskegee.

Among the projects we have been considering for the coming summer are: high grade recreational programs in selected Negro communities of the South, perhaps with interracial staff; vacations for selected Negro children 12 to 14 years of age in homes and camps of the North and ~~South~~ EAST; participation in tutorial programs in Southern communities where such efforts would be helpful and welcomed. Also, we may underwrite the salary of one or two top professors for a teaching situation in selected Southern Negro colleges for the summer session. Tentative arrangements are already being made with Miles College in Birmingham.

If these or other projects occur to you as areas in which a Northern-based organization such as ours could play a limited but useful role, it would be helpful to hear from you and to meet with you as indicated above.

Sincerely yours,

Walter Lawton

Dear Mr. Dunbar:

Our mutual friend, Harold Fleming, has suggested that I write you in reference to my search for factual information on actions being taken within the business community in the area of race relations.

We are interested in seeing a variety of past studies and case histories, information on work in progress, and would like to be on your mailing list for future materials. We are pulling all of this together for a "Businessman's Report on Race Relations" service soon to be announced.

Harold feels it would be useful for me to see your back files of "L" reports and to be on the list for future copies,and also suggested your upcoming study on "the cost of discrimination". I understand that you also are doing individual city studies which would be helpful.

If it is not asking too much, I would appreciate having someone go through your old files for everything pertaining to the relationship of business and race. Your Atlanta survey on "Plans for Progress," the study on "Racial Crises and the Press,"and your article on "The Annealing of the South," are some examples of what we need.

I have been active in the human relations field for some years and last August served as information coordinator for the March on Washington. From this background and my work with business clients, I feel that there is a particular need at this time for a service which pulls much of the information together for use by employers.

We are also on the lookout for individual companies doing a good job whom we might interview for case study reports. Any suggestions would be appreciated.

At the same time I would like to subscribe to "The New South". Please send me a bill on this, including any costs for the other publications.

I do hope that I can talk to you very soon about this project. Please let me know if you are planning a trip to Washington.

Sincerely,

Dear Mr. Apter:

We are sending you, under separate cover, a bundle of things. We are also putting you on a mailing list, and entering a subscription for New South.

I would think the best source for names of companies doing well would be the President's Committee. Places which would occur to us would be, among others, Douglas Aircraft in Charlotte, Lockheed here in Marietta, and International Harvester in Memphis. Some smaller companies might be of interest, and here I would think the President's Committee could be particularly helpful with suggestions.

I have no present plans for coming to Washington, but I usually get up there a few times a year. I'll certainly look forward to meeting you. In the meantime, please let me know if there are other things we can help with -- and best wishes to you in your venture.

Dear Mr. Mitchell:

We know of your interest in arbitration and, therefore, you might care to become a member of our Association. We would be pleased to have you and I am sure you will find affiliation with us worthwhile.

Membership would keep you informed of the latest developments in arbitration. For instance, we publish the highly popular Summary of Labor Arbitration Awards each month (with index quarterly), as well as the Arbitration News, quarterly Arbitration Journal, quarterly Digest of Court Decisions, quarterly Lawyers' Arbitration Letter, also frequent research and educational bulletins. As a part of our research program, in 1961, Harper & Row published "Labor-Management Contracts at Work," by Morris Stone, Editorial Director of the AAA. Mr. Stone's second book, "Managerial Freedom and Job Security," has recently come off the press. Both of these books are sent to members without charge. More publications will be coming out during the balance of the year.

We are conscious of the need to develop new techniques in the area of labor arbitration to meet the challenges of our changing technology. We have study groups in several regions occupied with the problem. Undoubtedly, you would benefit from our research and educational work, the results of which we are constantly publishing either as special reports or in one of our standard publications, described above.

The membership fee for individuals is $50 per year. Your membership would be tax deductible since we are a non-profit, educational organization and are supported by case fees and by memberships.

In bringing the benefits of membership in the Association to your attention, I feel it is important to emphasize that service on our National Panel of Arbitrators is not one of them.

Our membership and panel records are kept in separate departments, and our use or non-use of your professional talents as arbitrator will not be influenced in any way by your response to this letter.

I do hope, however, that you will give this invitation favorable consideration. We need new members to help support our growing service, and I am confident you will find our publications and service of value.

Sincerely,

AMERICAN ARBITRATION ASSOCIATION

140 WEST 51st STREET NEW YORK, N. Y. 10020

No. 5, 1964

PRESIDENT'S REPORT TO THE ANNUAL MEETING—JUNE 9, 1964

WHEN THE thirty-eighth annual meeting of the American Arbitration Association is called to order on June 9 in the Association's new headquarters, the prevailing mood will be one of optimism. That this should be so is understandable, for the physical surroundings in themselves will be evidence of the progress which made the move to larger quarters both possible and necessary. Nineteen sixty-three saw a twenty percent rise in AAA's case load over 1962, and plans for merger with the General Arbitration Council of the Textile Industry, effective May 1, 1964, were completed. The year also saw laws improved in a number of states, new educational materials produced by AAA, important promotional steps taken, and organizational measures carried through for better arbitration service.

This would be an impressive record for any year, and it would be tempting to use the occasion of this annual report for a full account of all that has been accomplished. We believe, however, that it would be more constructive at this time to involve AAA members, potential members, arbitrators, and users of the Association's tribunal services in a discussion of several problems, created by our growth, that have occupied the attention of Directors, officers and staff members during the past year.

SUPPORTING THE TRIBUNALS

Our first premise for this discussion is that private, voluntary arbitration is important to American industry and labor and that the American Arbitration Association —the only non-governmental agency available for all types of arbitration everywhere in the United States—deserves to be supported by those who benefit directly or indirectly from the Association's services. The Association can sustain losses in particular operations for a while, especially when they are in an experimental stage. But in the long run, only a viable organizational structure and a secure financial basis can give business organizations and the labor-management community the remedy for disputes they expect when they use arbitration clauses in commercial documents of every description, in insurance policies, and in collective agreements.

Here we come upon a dilemma: arbitration has developed in the United States at an uneven rate, and not all types of arbitration have developed the same degree of self-support. The most widely distributed of AAA's tribunal systems is labor-management arbitration, but the fee charged by the Association for this type of service has never been high enough to cover actual costs of operation. The $5 per case increase which was put into effect in 1958 helped to meet the inflationary rise, but it was not sufficient to correct the imbalance between operating costs and tribunal income. The result is that the Association today maintains a system of arbitration which accounts for about 44 percent of its tribunal work, but which produces only about 20 percent of tribunal income. Admittedly, the typical labor arbitration case involves less staff work than does the average commercial case. But even taking this factor into consideration, the disparity remains a serious one. As a consequence, AAA Regional Offices having a high volume of labor arbitration and relatively few commercial or accident claims cases are compelled to operate at a financial loss. Clearly, a self-supporting labor tribunal may not be a possibility in the foreseeable future, but some upward adjustment in the income derived from labor arbitration services is both justified and necessary. Whether this is to be accomplished by increased case fees, more membership support, or by a combination of the two is now under discussion.

UNEVEN DEVELOPMENT OF COMMERCIAL ARBITRATION

The situation is otherwise in regions where non-labor arbitration cases predominate. Although the Association sets its commercial case fees at a modest level, in keeping with its non-profit character, those fees are generally sufficient to cover the costs of administration. Moreover, rising costs and inflationary pressures are offset by the fact that commercial fees, consisting of a percentage of the amount claimed, tend to rise as cases involve larger sums. The Association's financial problem with commercial arbitration is therefore not that the basic fee schedule is inadequate, but that commercial cases appear in high volume in only a few of the regions. Whether the case load is high or low, panels must be maintained everywhere, and trained personnel must be available for service at all times. This places on AAA a burden that would be eased considerably if the business community in all or most parts of the country used commercial arbitration as widely as it does in some. For that reason, efforts during 1963 were directed at finding new uses for commercial arbitration and at bringing a greater awareness of these uses to the bar and the business community.

RAPID GROWTH OF UNINSURED MOTORIST ARBITRATION

Uninsured motorist arbitration—the Association's newest tribunal—has grown so rapidly that it accounted for almost as many cases in 1963 as did the labor-management arbitration tribunal. The rate of growth is continuing, as the legislatures of an increasing number of states are making it mandatory for insurance companies to protect motorists against personal injury caused by uninsured and hit-and-run drivers, and as insurance companies include AAA arbitration clauses in their policies. The present fee structure meets the needs of the Association, the insurance companies and the policy-holders, who are usually the claimants in uninsured motorist cases. The latter initiate arbitration with a filing fee of $50, regardless of the amount claimed. The insurance companies pay a larger sum, computed every year to compensate the Association for the total costs of administration. It was to provide insurance companies and their policy-holders with efficient arbitration service that the Association undertook the financial and organizational obligation of new regional offices in recent years. These offices also administer commercial and labor cases, and they are centers of education and promotion work in their areas. But they remain heavily dependent upon uninsured motorist arbitration, without which they would not be financially solvent. There is at present no end in sight for uninsured motorist arbitration; the volume of cases continues to grow in all states where arbitration systems have been established, and new states are joining the list. But the uninsured motorist arbitration was designed for a specific purpose, and no prudent administrator of arbitration can disregard the possibility that the general problem of uninsured motorists may be solved. Uninsured motorist arbitration cases would then level off, and perhaps even decline. As in the problems discussed above, the prudent course for the Association is to develop a variety of arbitration systems so that no regional office will be entirely dependent upon one. Only in this way will the Association's future be secure.

NEW MEMBERSHIP FEE STRUCTURE

So far, we have been discussing the Association's tribunal activities—the portion of AAA's work which produces income on a case-by-case basis. There are other functions, however – education, publications, research and development—that serve the public at large and must be supported by general contributions. About 19 percent of the Association's income is derived from annual membership dues, paid by companies, labor unions, trade associations, civic groups and individuals who acknowledge the obligation of the public to support private institutions that serve it. Among AAA members are many organizations that invoke their AAA arbitration clauses frequently. But there are just as many who recognize that the mere use of an AAA clause in a contract, regardless of whether disputes arise that must be arbitrated, entails an obligation to support the Association, for without this support, it would be impossible for AAA to maintain its National Panel of Arbitrators, to conduct its legal research, and to perform all the other standby services.

Arbitration has been likened to a fire department, in that both require support from the public whether the contingency occurs or not. Indeed, without AAA's standby services, an arbitration clause would be like a fire alarm box with no fire station at the other end of the line. For this reason, a corporation's use of AAA services does not directly measure its obligation for support.

Until recently, the Association's schedule of membership fees lacked a logical relationship between the size of the donor organization and the level of contribution. It was perhaps not necessary to establish such a relationship in the past, when AAA was smaller and had fewer financial and other obligations. But with the growth of arbitration and the increased demand for services of all kinds, it became necessary to put the membership structure on a more sound basis. This was done in 1963.

In general, there are now five classes of membership. Individuals—usually arbitrators, educators, and lawyers not affiliated with law firms—are regarded as associate members. The other classes are: educational institutions, corporations, labor unions, and law firms. All receive the Association's literature and basic services, although corporate members may name several persons on their staffs as recipients of this material. Educational institutions and individuals may join for $50 per year. Corporate membership fees are scaled by the number of employees, ranging from $50 for those having fewer than 100 employees, to $1000 a year for those having more than 7500. Corporations in the latter category may generally be expected to exceed the indicated figure. AAA memberships for unions also range from $50 to $1000, depending upon size, and law firms may join the Association for $125.

INCREASED INCOME USED FOR BETTER SERVICE

The new fee schedule has been in effect for less than a year, but it has already produced gratifying results. Most member organizations, on being told the purpose of the increase, have not hesitated to conform to the new schedule. Some members, limited by previous budgetary commitments, were able to put only part of the increase into effect this year, but they agreed that the new schedule was justified and indicated their intention of meeting it in 1965. And to our regret, but as was to be expected, a few members decided to discontinue their membership. By and large, the experience has been satisfactory. New members have been recruited to compensate for the small losses, and the greater income now available through membership contributions is putting the Association in a better position to fulfill its obligations to the public. Moreover, it is relevant at this point to add that although contributions to AAA reflect the public's recognition of its obligation to support the institutions that serve it, they bring practical returns to the donor, for they enable the Association to carry forward the education and publication program which member organizations use as a supplement to the work of their staffs.

THE SEARCH FOR NEW FIELDS OF USEFULNESS

A recurrent theme throughout this report has been: We must find new uses for commercial arbitration and new areas of service to the public. This theme has also guided the activities of the staff during 1963.

Typical of the projects undertaken was the development of special arbitration clauses for disputes between prime contractors and subcontractors doing work for the Federal Government. Heretofore, prime contractors could appeal to government contracting officers in case of dispute over payment for extra work, or in case of a controversy with a government agency over the workmanlike performance of contract obligations. But subcontractors, to whom the prime contractor may have assigned work, with the Government's permission, had no such avenue of appeal. After extensive discussions with attorneys representing companies doing Defense Department work, a special arbitration clause was devised which overcomes this gap. When this clause is used in agreements between the prime contractor and a subcontractor, the latter may prosecute his claim against the former in arbitration, unless the prime contractor agrees to represent the subcontractor in proceedings before the government contracting officer.

Similar alertness to newly developing problems and to the possibility that arbitration may play a broader role than it has in the past was also evident in two surveys, one conducted among thousands of attorneys whose practice consists in large part of negligence actions, and another among more than six thousand corporate counsel. The results of these surveys will be published in a form that will be of value to users of AAA tribunals.

Recognizing that lasting progress in developing arbitration depends upon local support in the regions, the Association is establishing Regional Advisory Councils, consisting of civic, business and labor leaders in all parts of the country. Their function will be to recommend activities and procedures that will make the Association a more useful institution in the area. We hope that as they become more familiar with our work they will assume an increasingly important role in guiding the affairs of our regional offices.

TECHNIQUES FOR SETTLING NEW LABOR PROBLEMS

The search for new fields of usefulness is not limited to commercial arbitration. During 1963, the Association decided to create a new division to help unions and management set up continuing bilateral and tripartite off-the-record discussions of matters that can not usually be dealt with during the short time available for negotiation of new agreements. Automation problems come to mind quickly as examples of issues so complex that long periods of preparation and the help of neutrals may be needed. But "continuous bargaining techniques" have been used successfully to solve other issues as well—issues which, for one reason or another, have defied resolution during conventional bargaining.

The response of the trade and general press to AAA's announcement of a new service to help labor and management resolve difficult problems is shown in this montage of clippings.

Unlike AAA's labor arbitration service, the new activities will not result in final and binding decisions. The emphasis will be on arriving at mutual understandings which the parties will themselves express in future contracts. To avoid any misunderstanding or confusion, the new service will operate independently of the Association's tribunals. In announcing the new program, the Association made it clear that the object was not to intervene in current bargaining or work stoppage problems, functions which are very well performed by Federal, State and local agencies. Thus, the Association will not compete with other mediation bodies, but will perform a needed service for which AAA, by virtue of its experience and impartial standing, is uniquely qualified.

The Association is being assisted in the new project by an Advisory Committee, consisting of nationally known arbitrators and impartial experts. The first practical application of the new service was the sponsoring of a three-day conference in Tampa during January 1964, at which high-ranking officers of newspapers and unions discussed serious problems of automation and manpower displacement in the newspaper publishing industry.

Commenting on the Association's decision to broaden the scope of its services, an editorial in the New York Times on December 16, 1963, declared: "The virtual disappearance of strikes as a means of resolving grievences growing out of the interpretation of labor-management contracts is largely attributable to the missionary efforts of the American Arbitration Association. Since World War II its activities have helped make arbitration an almost universal replacement for economic muscle in settling such disputes. Now the Association is extending its sphere of usefulness by addressing itself to the tortuous new difficulties automation is creating for collective bargaining. Its aim is to assist unions and employers in establishing machinery for continuous discussion of their mutual problems—away from the countdown pressures of a contract's expiring hours. Many industries already have taken the first steps in this direction and have found the new devices beneficial in promoting better understanding."

A BUSY YEAR AHEAD

This report has dealt at length with basic policy questions and with important new objectives. It has of necessity omitted discussion of many day-to-day problems and accomplishments. Nevertheless, a few of these developments should be mentioned briefly. Several years ago, the Association began decentralizing some of its activities, giving Regional Managers a wider scope of autonomy over arbitration case administration and promotion within their areas. This program was carried forward during 1963. At the same time, staff functions in New York headquarters were improved, and standards for case administration were made more uniform through a set of manuals, distributed to all Regional Managers and discussed at a conference of managers in New York.

As usual, the Association's Education Department and the Regional Managers participated in several hundred meetings, conferences and seminars on all aspects of arbitration. Articles on commercial arbitration were prepared for about thirty trade magazines, and bar association journals reflected the increasing interest in commercial and accident claims arbitration among lawyers. Three new brochures were added to the Association's list of publications, and a new book, Managerial Freedom and Job Security, by AAA Vice President Morris Stone, was published by Harper & Row. This volume, as was an earlier book, Labor-Management Contracts at Work, is based upon labor arbitration awards published in the American Arbitration Association's monthly serv-

THE NEW YORK ARBITRATION LAW

Article 75, Civil Practice Law and Rules

Effective September 1, 1963, the New York Arbitration Statute is contained in Article 75, sections 7501-7514 of the Civil Practice Law and Rules (hereinafter called "CPLR"). Experience under Article 84 of the Civil Practice Act (hereinafter called CPA) was generally satisfactory but revealed certain defects in its statutory scheme which the Legislature revised in the new statute.

The basic principles of the earlier arbitration statute have, for the most part, been retained. The revisions present in the new law are designed to improve the organization of the statute, to clarify the law of arbitration, to eliminate certain anomalies, and to improve arbitration procedure. The new article on arbitration (the text of which is appended hereto) retains desirable principles of the pre-existing law [illegible] modifications:

In many ways, tribunal administration is a matter of routine and careful attention to details. But helping parties plan arbitration procedures and overcome some of the difficulties that arise also calls for both originality and ingenuity. On several occasions during the year, companies and unions that have encountered special problems in labor arbitration called upon the Association to set up rotating panels and other procedures which, in effect, give those parties some of the advantages of permanent umpire systems, along with the advantages of ad hoc arbitration.

The American Arbitration Association has every reason to face its thirty-ninth year with confidence. The need for education about arbitration and for tribunal services is boundless, the apparatus for filling that need exists in AAA and its network of Regional Offices and Advisory Councils, and the financial support of those who benefit most from AAA's accomplishments will be forthcoming. The accompanying financial report, reflecting careful management, shows no deficit. But there is a great deficit, in terms of work to be done. With the continued generous support of the business and labor-management communities, the next year should see further notable progress.

Dear Miss Ansley:

Mr. Leslie Dunbar has asked that I respond to your letter concerning possible employment this summer, in civil rights programs.

I am afraid we do not have any suggestions. Mr. John Youngblut, at Quaker House, informs us that you have been in contact with him about the Quaker House as a possible place of employment. If Mr. Youngblut can find a place for you in his summer program, we heartily recommend this as a valuable and interesting way to spend the summer.

The only other suggestion that we have is that you write to Mrs. Marian Glustrum at the Community Council of The Atlanta Area, Palmer Building, Atlanta, advising her of your interest in summer work. Mrs. Glustrum coordinates summer programs in the area of your interest.

You may also write to the Atlanta-Fulton County Economic Opportunity Authority, 101 Marietta Street Bldg., Room 610, Atlanta, and inquire as to the possibilities of summer employment. Write direct to Dr. Tilman Cothran, who is Associate Director of the Anti-Poverty Program.

We trust this information will be of help to you, and wish you success in your endeavors.

Sincerely yours,

Vernon E. Jordan, Jr.

Dear Dr. Dunbar -

Could you please send me any information you have available on civil rights programs which could use student help this summer in Atlanta? Having been born and brought up mostly in Atlanta, & then in Columbus, my social conscience won't let me alone for one more summer.

I am a freshman at Radcliffe College this year, & there are quite a few programs run from up here that I could get involved in. From my experience so far, however, I think locally-oriented programs are usually much better, & I'd rather work in one of those if possible.

I'm not very definite on what exactly I want to do. (That's a great help I know) - I would certainly want to be involved with people; probably the educational end with children is where I've had the most experience. (I'm working in a Cambridge Housing project this year.)

Of course, it doesn't have to be a paying job, and I'm pretty sure I will be able to take a full time one, though it is not absolutely certain yet.

Excuse the vagueness - it's just that I'm still in the exploratory stage. Please let me know as soon as is convenient.

Sincerely,
Jan Ansley

Dear Mr. Dunbar:

We have submitted to you the financial statements for Southern Regional Council, Inc. for the year ended December 31, 1964 accompanied by our professional opinion on those statements.

In the course of our examination of those statements we observed certain situations in which it appeared that improvements could be made. Your attention is invited to the following situations which in our opinion should be given further study leading to corrective action.

Internal control is very important in any organization and in an organization which handles funds of a restricted nature, it becomes increasingly so. You seem to have sufficient employees to assign work tasks in such a manner as to achieve this control.

It is desirable that procedures for handling incoming checks and money should provide for the immediate placing of a restrictive endorsement on all checks, and the preparation of a list of the incoming receipts by the person who opens the mail. The original of this list accompanied by any transmittal letters or other supporting documents would go to the Secretary-Treasurer and a copy of the list accompanied by the checks and money received would be forwarded to the person responsible for making the bank deposit. A validated deposit ticket would be returned to Mrs. Alexander for comparison with her list. Good internal control dictates that the person responsible for recording cash receipts be freed from any cash-handling functions.

As far as we have been able to determine there is no requirement that state councils and other cooperating agencies give to Southern Regional Council a receipt for all amounts paid to them. In view of the size of these grants it seems desirable that a signed acknowledgement be required for each payment.

At present, the filing system for personnel information is inadequate. A satisfactory practice is to maintain one file folder on each employee. This folder would contain the employee's application for employment, the authorization for his original rate of pay, authorizations for any changes in position or rate of pay, signed up-to-date exemption certificates for State and Federal income taxes, and authorization for any overtime compensation. We have discussed this inadequacy with Mrs. Alexander and she concurs with our thinking.

The accounts which are presently in use by Southern Regional Council are sufficient to satisfy accounting needs but it is our belief that they could be better organized by using a systematic numerical designation for each account. The design of a chart of accounts with groupings of similar accounts would expedite logical interpretation of financial data.

In this connection it should be mentioned that the general ledger should be posted and balanced each month.

Our general impression of your office situation was that while all information needed was available it sometimes required excessive time for it to be located. Although the scope of our work did not include an investigation of the reasons for this difficulty, we did feel that it should be mentioned.

We do have some thoughts concerning the handling of your cash disbursements which we would be glad to discuss at your convenience.

These suggestions are offered in a constructive spirit. Good procedures which embody adequate internal controls are a prerequisite to high quality in financial data.

Again may we express our appreciation for the courtesy and cooperation extended to us by you and your staff.

Yours truly,

Hal Harden, Jr.

Dear Friend:

At the suggestion of one of our members, we are pleased to invite you to participate in our Eighth Annual Membership Meeting, which will be held at Atlanta University in Atlanta, Georgia on Thursday, Friday and Saturday, June 24, 25 and 26.

Our annual membership meetings have traditionally provided an opportunity for us to share with friends our unique reservoir of information concerning the cultural contributions of Africans and persons of African descent. This year our conference theme is The Changing Role of the African and the American Negro. We will be especially concerned with the development of a greater awareness on the part of the community at large of the relationship which exists between the cultural contributions of the black man and his quest for freedom and dignity.

In addition to our own well-known educators, writers and musicologist listed on the enclosed program, we expect to have as special guest panelists from Africa the Ambassador to the United States from Uganda, His Excellency Dr. Solomon Asea; the outstanding Nigerian playwright, Mr. Wole Soyinka; Mr. Christopher Kolade, Director of Programs for Nigerian Television Service; Monsieur Charles Delgado, Secretary of Embassy, Economic Affairs, Senegal Mission to the United Nations; Mr. Sam Akpabot, a well-known composer and musician from Nigeria; and Mr. Stanlake Samkange, politician, businessman and educator from Rhodesia.

We will have the honor of presenting at our banquet Sir Wilberforce Nadiope, Vice President of Uganda. Also for the banquet program we have invited Mr. James Farmer, National Director of CORE, to speak and the internationally-renowned American Negro folk singer, Odetta, to be special guest artist.

The AMSAC Eighth Annual Membership Meeting will be our first major activity in the South--other meetings have been held in New York City, Philadelphia, Washington, D.C., Los Angeles and Cleveland. It is our sincere hope, therefore, that you and friends of yours in the Atlanta area will join us on this occasion. For your convenience, we are enclosing a registration form and reply envelope. It will be greatly appreciated if this is returned to me on or before Friday, June 11. We look forward to seeing you in Atlanta and to hearing from you as soon as possible.

Sincerely,

Dear Mr. Anthony:

Because of our concern with the prospects for our growing cities, towns, and counties, we hope you can join us on November 15 in a conference on urban affairs which our organizations have arranged. The program features our distinguished congressmen and other officials who have much to tell us about federal assistance programs.

As one who has shown a keen interest in the problems of your community, we believe you will want to attend. Information about the program at the Biltmore Hotel in Atlanta is enclosed. Reservations will be limited and we urge you to register as early as possible.

We look forward to seeing you on November 15, and hope you will pass the word along to others.

Thanks for your clarification on the accounting procedures with the project funds. I see no reason why we cannot follow the method you suggest and not concern ourselves with physically separating the money. Besides, we pay you too much money not to follow your advice.

Dear Paul:

This to clarify the thoughts which we had concerning the handling of the Ford Foundation money. The basic question seems to be that of whether or not this money should be physically separate or whether a separate accounting for the funds would satisfy all parties concerned.

If physical separation of the money is required or preferred by Ford then this decides the question. In this event checks would be written against the Citizens Trust account.

However, if it is not necessary for the funds to be physically separated it is probably more efficient to handle them as follows:

1. Deposit grant funds to Citizens Trust account.
2. Handle any temporary investments through the Citizens Trust account.
3. Transfer funds in fairly sizable amounts to the First National account as they are required for operation of the various Ford projects.
4. Write checks on the First National account for all project expenditures.

This method of handling does not in any way impede a separate accounting for the money. Your accounting system is specifically designed to furnish this information.

You would also be placing the larger bank balance with Citizens Trust. This account would have very few transactions and would thus be more desirable from your banker's viewpoint.

An additional advantage is the efficiency of using only one set of checks for regular expenditures. It is quite conceivable that one check could be written for expenses which are partly chargeable to the Ford projects and partly chargeable to other projects or to general operations.

I hope that these thoughts will be of some assistance to you. Best wishes for a happy holiday season.

Cordially,

Pat Davis

Mr. Paul Anthony
Southern Regional Council

Atlanta, Georgia

Dear Paul:

This morning I received a call from Mr. Peter White of Education for Freedom in Atlanta. For the past month, I have been working with Mr. White on a project with students organizing a program of support for President Johnson's policy in Vietnam. One of the things we have both been concerned about for some time is the racial composition of the group. While the group is not segregated in nature, we feel that not enough effort has been made to fully develop contacts with the negro student community.

Mr. White called this morning to bring to my attention what he feels is an unfortunate polarization taking place in Georgia between the white and negro communities on the question of Vietnam. The SNCC position and the question of Julian Bond's seating as a member of the Georgia legislature seem to have brought the problem to a head.

I have asked Mr. White to call you and discuss with you his thinking on the problem. I have also suggested to him that you might be able to put him in contact with members of the negro community who would support the President's policy in Vietnam in order to more fully integrate the activities of the "Affirmation: Vietnam".

I hope you will be able to give Mr. White some help in this area. I think it would be unfortunate if the Vietnam issue became an excuse for the "red-necks" to red-bait the civil rights organizations as well as the negro community. I fear that this may happen and feel that everything should be done to have people on both sides of the issue from the negro community be actively involved. in the various organizations

I guess I haven't had a chance to congratulate you on your new job. I hope it is going very well for you and look forward to seeing you somethime in the not distant future either in New York or in Atlanta. If you see Connie, give her my regards.

Sincerely,

Greg

Dear Mr. Anthony:

Jim Terry of the Antioch-Putney staff has asked me to conduct a tour of the South for twelve students from the school. We will begin in Durham tomorrow. We expect to be in Atlanta on Tuesday, June 27, and I would like to bring them to the SRC office at that time.

Most of the students are returned Peace Corps Volunteers who have been interning in all-Negro public schools in Washington and Baltimore during the past school year. With one exception, they have had no experience in the South. If you could arrange for someone to familiarize them with SRC's work, I would appreciate it.

I have asked Jody Palmour of Emory to contact you as he will be arranging our schedule while we're in the city.

Mr. Paul Anthony, Director
Southern Regional Council
5 Forsyth Street, N. W.
Atlanta, Georgia

After spending seven years and ten months in the Marine Corps, I was honorably discharged in San Francisco, after traveling around the country a few months, I came to Atlanta, where I worked at odd jobs until in 1962-1963, I became involved in Demorcatic Party Canidate's campaigns. I discovered that I had the ability to organize communities and politicians began to turn to me for help in campaigns. However, I became disllusioned when candidates I has supported failed to keep their campaign promises, and I subsequently left the hypocrisy of campaign politics.

I got involved working for several civil rights organizations, but considered myself not a civil rights worker but a human rights worker, enabling me to avoid the self-alination such work sometimes involves and communicate with both black and white communities, ghetto and well-to-do. This ability to talk to people of conflicting interest and attitudes(i.e. the poor blacks and white politicians) influenced EOA to recurit me to help organize in Atlanta in 1965. The first step wast to go into the communities and discover the natural areas and to begin the work of Community Organization and set up Advisory Boards. The object was to help organize these Technicial Neighborhood Boards to bring together the poor whites and blacks of the neighborhoods. These were the steps preperatory to the eventual organization of Neighborhood Service Centers and were realized with the perspective of being eventual liasons with the City, Welfare Agencies, Educational functions and United Appeal agencies. The point of concentration in the organization of the Advisory Councils were the youth's needs of the area in home conditions, jobs, educational institutions, recreational and cultural opportunities. Durning this period of organization of EOA, I was commissoned to set up a bi-racial committies. And was able to do this on the common ground ground of economic need.

Durning the same year, I was appointed by Mr. Dan Sweat, Administrative Assistant to the Mayor, to assist in organizing the Neighborhood Youth Corps in Atlanta, I reruited over 800 young people in a three month period from the local communities. This was accomplished not through existing agencies, but through personal direct contact with the youth involved.

This work entailed couseling for a work situation, advising the youths on personal experience and apperance as well as where to look for a job; these and others were the elements that had to go into the preperation and training for employment. The youths involved were all hard-core delinquent types that had dropped out of school.

In 1966, I organized a project which attracted the attention of both City and National Goverments as a new concept of organization directed to meeting the needs of hard-core juvenile deliquents with a criminal record. This program was known as the "House of U.S.E." (Understanding, Stimulation and Education). The project was designed in a street worker framework, its purpose being to acquire job training and job development education and couseling programs and have a center where the youth could feel at home. All had criminal records; Judges sent youths to the"House of U.S.E."for help. The federal funds to the project were suddenly cut and to keep the House alive, I donated personal funds and was eventually forced to declare bankruptcy. This House of U.S.E. showed other agencies the need for this type of involvement, and now they concentrate on similar efforts to involve the hard core deliquent in their programs.

The Board of Directors includes many of the most influential men in Atlanta, for the project was sold to them not in terms of charity but in terms of economics. Community Orgainizers came to the project to design others similar to it in their own communities.

I have worked with over 500 youths, who had records, to date, only thirteen returned to prision.

In 1967, I returned to Economic Opportunity Atlanta, Inc., as the Director of Youth Development. In this position, I was instrumental in the organization of youth programs involving recreational, cultural and employment opportunities in areas which had not previously organized : Techwood, Blair Village, West End, Summerhill, Pittsburgh, Cabbagetown and the Boulevard Area. All these programs were set up in lower income areas of the city resulting on the organization of seven full-time youth centers in these areas.

In the summer of 1968, Atlanta developed an increased recreation, employment, and cultural program for young people across the city and outlying regions. I assisted in writing the proposals for the Atlanta summer recreation programs, including the budgets and personnel expenditures. The proposals included not only EOA but other community agencies in the areas involved. It has been considered the most comprehensive recreational program in the country.They were presented to Washington and brought $ 600,000 into Atlanta from the Federal Goverment.

The theroy of these proposlas was to employ and involve as many youth as possible not being served by any agency with the intent of continuing programs beyond the summer, The frame of reference of the proposals was to place the responsibiliites not on an outsider, but on young people of the area. The program was oriented to youth councils representing the community and its needs rather than the superimposed external structure elements.

I helped get the Young Men's Civic League chartered. The League's purpose is to prevent young people from entering a life of crime, the method being to hire ex-convicts as job recruiters in the ghettos who now work for the Labor Department. Three thousand youths and young adults were recruited in a ninety-day period. In addition, I helped develop a program for the probation of those eligible from Reidsville State Prision and the Alto Industrial School by acquiring jobs for them-making parole possible.

I have conducted investigations for the Atlanta Commission on Crime and Juvenile Deliquency that contributed to their 1966 report, Opportunity fro Urban Excellence. The report was complied under the direction of Hugh Peterson, Jr., Esquire, of King and Spalding Attorneys.

I have written numerous artivles that appeared in "SRC" "New South" the Atlanta Journal and Atlanta Constitution, Amercian Profile (a nationally syndicated radio program), and others; one of these articles is being made into a film, In addition I have lectured at the University of Georgia Georgia State College, Emory University, Atlanta University, Federal City College and Auburn University. Presently, I am the Director of Youth Development for Economic Opportunity Atlanta, Inc., and am working on a follow-up ~~report~~ program of the Alto Industrial School project. And many other youth programs.

Walter Anderson's application is, indeed, in the machinery. He seems to be an unusual candidate. We hope something will turn up for him. However, because of recent legislative cutbacks in federal employment, we have very few positions open. When a suitable vacancy occurs, we will certainly consider Mr. Anderson.

Your interest is appreciated.

When Will This American Indian Child Catch Up.....

.....With The Rest Of The World?

For years this American Indian child lived within his own culture and environment — a culture that did not require knowledge of modern time, savings and labor.

The early American Indian followed streams and waterways seeking game, fruits and roots that furnished him with food, clothing, tools and shelter.

But then came the whitemen; explorers, farmers, missionaries and traders. They burst forth upon the land, ripped through its forests, plowed up the rich grazing lands, laid iron rails across its broad expanse. Then for the protection of the non-Indian and the Indian, the Federal Government made numerous treaties with the tribes and set out areas of land within which they could live. The American Indian loved his land, a feeling so well expressed by Chief Joseph of the Nez Perz:

"The earth is my mother. I was made of the earth and grew up in its bosom. The earth, my mother and nurse, is very sacred to me; too sacred to be valued for gold and silver. I cannot give up my mother, the land that raised me. We are all content here. I will not trade these and my habit of going where I please for this new life which you propose for us."

Unfortunately, American Indians were accorded scant attention during the three quarters of a century that began with the creation of the reservations and ended with the Second World War. Isolated from most of their neighbors by distance and cultural differences, the American Indian has been commonly regarded as little more than a picturesque addition to the scenery. Poor roads alone were enough to keep most Indians in and most visitors out.

Serious problems still confront the Indians of the United States. Most Indians are poor. On most reservations whole families subsist on incomes of less than $750 annually. In a number of communities at least half of the wage earners receive welfare assistance for part of the year. Indian homes are almost universally below accepted non-Indian standards; only a few homes have running water or electricity and sanitary facilities are lacking.

Many an Indian child is not attending school regularly. Health statistics, often a reliable guide to the well-being of a people, reveal Indians have a life expectancy of 37 years, compared to a non-Indian average of 62 years. The incidence of tuberculosis is 9 times that of the general population. Intestinal diseases are 11 times higher among Indians than for the country as a whole. Few Indians are participating in social processes outside their home communities. Only a handful of Indians have held state or county offices and many, for want of communications and economic stability, are prevented from taking an active interest in the affairs of their own tribal government.

Arrow, Inc. is a tax-exempt organization formed to assist Indian people in self-help community or group programs and projects.

ARROW MAKES IT POSSIBLE FOR INDIANS TO:

TRAIN LEADERS through scholarship grants and experience in community program planning and management

IMPROVE HEALTH through health education, sanitation and home improvement programs; information on the use and value of medical services

IMPROVE EDUCATION through providing opportunity for adult education and vocational traning programs, as well as materials for sewing groups and visual aids in community work

DEVELOP RESOURCES through seeking adequate water supplies for domestic use and to defeat disease; through stimulating the development and protection of resources through surveys

DISSEMINATE INFORMATION through educational programs and informational bulletins; inform the general public on facts pertaining to Indian affairs

These projects are designed by Indians for Indians and are administered by Indians. Beginning with individual communities, tribes and pueblos, Arrow, Inc. works with Indian leaders who are moving in constructive directions and driving home their programs which will assure continuing group support.

This is the background of today's Indian child. He is a vital part of America's past. He will be a vital part of the future. But he cannot make it without YOUR help!

Please join with Arrow in helping these American Indian children and their families. The future of this child — working within a community — improving his home — securing an education — depends on you!

AIRLIE HOUSE is operated by Airlie Foundation as an educational and research conference center. The facility is offered for use to groups who wish to study and work in privacy and informality. The primary purpose of The Center is to encourage the exchange of ideas and to provide a forum for the discussion of the problems within our society.

Airlie House is the first rural center of its type accessible to the Nation's Capital. Distinguished speakers are readily available from private life, The Congress, government agencies, research centers, universities, and industry without the problems of excessive expense or time lost in travel. This Center, therefore offers distinct advantages for conferences in national and international affairs.

Airlie House is operated by Airlie Foundation, a non-profit corporation chartered by the Commonwealth of Virginia. The facility is not operated to produce a continuing profit. Airlie House is designed to provide a modern, functional conference center maintained in a rural setting. Charges for the use of the Center are contingent upon achieving these goals.

Airlie House

Silo House

International House

Conferences at Airlie

During its first years of operation, Airlie has achieved a distinguished reputation in the conference field. Outstanding groups of educators, scientists, government officials, diplomats, students and many others from all parts of the world have participated in conferences and seminars here.

A successful conference requires special skills in planning and a special atmosphere to achieve its purpose. The staff at Airlie has a wealth of experience in providing the necessary elements for serious conferences. The center itself has been designed specifically to offer visitors the privacy and freedom from interruption that allow them the time and the atmosphere in which to think and to exchange ideas.

Accommodations

Two large Georgian manor houses form the nucleus of the center. They have been restored and enlarged to provide excellent conference facilities, while maintaining the traditional feeling of the Virginia countryside. Several large conference rooms for groups of up to three hundred people and a number of smaller rooms for group sessions and smaller meetings are available. Because of the physical relationship of the conference rooms, several groups may meet simultaneously in privacy without interruption.

Sleeping accommodations are situated in nearby restored buildings, all of which are within a few minutes' walk of Airlie House itself. Rooms are modern, air conditioned and are furnished in a simple and comfortable fashion that befits the country. Two hundred guests may stay overnight. If necessary, others may be accommodated at a nearby modern motel.

The kitchens at Airlie have been provided with the latest equipment. Cuisine is varied but specialized toward food native to Virginia. The management prides itself on serving interesting food in a pleasant atmosphere.

Conference Planning

The Airlie staff is ready to assist in planning conferences and in coordinating arrangements. The center requests that each conference director make a personal visit to Airlie to plan his conference in order that the arrangements will be wholly satisfactory.

Services and Equipment

A medical clinic has been established on the Airlie grounds to provide care for guests of the center.

Projection facilities for slides and motion pictures are available.

Audio taping by the resident staff may be arranged.

Special equipment may be obtained from Washington.

Laundry and dry cleaning services are available daily.

Barber and shoe shine are available by appointment.

Stamps, film and other articles may be ordered through the front desk.

Communications

Through Airlie Productions, a division of the foundation, documentary films may be planned and produced for training, broadcast and audience viewing.

Candid and portrait photography may be done by our staff photographers.

Publication and reproduction of conference reports and abstracts may be arranged.

REPORT FROM AIRLIE, a series of special, half hour, color television presentations are broadcast at intervals throughout the year. These programs cover a wide range of subjects.

Other programs are produced in cooperation with appropriate sponsoring institutions for broadcast and private viewing.

Church Information

Churches of all faiths are located in nearby Warrenton.

Recreation

Game Preserve—A large, private game preserve provides six months of excellent upland game shooting (October through March). Guides, dogs, guns and ammunition are available.

Airlie Lodge—A charming rustic hunting lodge is situated on the grounds for your informal enjoyment during the day or in the evening. It has been the scene of many gatherings at which conference participants could relax and enjoy themselves. A skeet field is nearby.

Swimming—A beautiful heated pool has been provided for your pleasure.

Gymnasium—A Sauna, Steam and Hydro-therapy room is available.

Fishing—Lakes and streams provide excellent fresh water sport.

Hiking—The countryside is ideal for a quiet walk or for a more ambitious hike through open, rolling fields and forests.

Tennis—A tennis court is located on the grounds for your use.

Riding—Quarter horses are available for trail riding with a choice of English or Western tack.

Golf—Two courses are available nearby. Transportation is provided.

Side Trips—Trips to the many historic shrines of Virginia may be arranged. The Manassas Battlefield, Thomas Jefferson's "Monticello", Colonial Williamsburg and the Virginia Tidewater country are all accessible from Airlie. The Skyline Drive and Shenandoah National Park are less than an hour away. The city of Washington, with its endless opportunities for sightseeing is forty-five miles away.

Location and Transportation

Airlie is located three miles west of Warrenton, Virginia on a 1200 acre estate in the foothills of the Blue Ridge Mountains. It is accessible throughout the year by four-lane highways from Dulles International and Washington National Airports as well as from Friendship International Airport in Baltimore. A heliport is available on the grounds, and a private landing strip is planned. Chartered buses and other private transportation from Washington may be arranged. There is regular bus service between Washington and Warrenton. Driving time is one hour from the Potomac River bridges.

Dear Doctor Mitchell:

The present world situation is a challenge to every one of us. There is today widespread unrest among nations; there is a rising tide of nationalism among those we used to regard as benighted peoples. The past twenty years have seen the resurgence of bigotry, persecution, and intolerance in the world. I could cite an unending series of examples of man's inhumanity to man.

I am sure that all thinking people of good will want to understand these forces and the tragic consequences which can overtake us if we in America do not take aggressive measures to prevent their growth. I am firmly of the opinion only governments can establish the climate for understanding, and that individuals must be given the opportunity to participate in effective action to halt the spread of intolerance. It seems to me that there are wide areas of agreement from which men of various races and creeds can embark on a program of mutual trust and action not only for the benefit of America but also for the better understanding of world problems.

In view of these desirable objectives and because of the great need for common understanding I will appreciate your reading the enclosed draft of a program known as "The Aaronsburg Story", which we will later pursue. To me it is a thrilling attempt to give substance and permanency to an idea carried out two years ago during Pennsylvania Week at Aaronsburg.

In a short time Mr. Arthur H. Lewis will telephone you for an appointment. If you would arrange to see Mr. Lewis and give him your comments and criticism of our contemplated project, I would greatly appreciate it.

With best wishes,

Cordially,

Encl.

FIRST DRAFT OF AARONSBURG STORY PLANS

A stronger America, and a world truly at peace, will become a reality only when there is complete religious understanding and a perfect friendly coordination among peoples of all faiths, beliefs and backgrounds.

While we recognize these concepts as self-evident, most of us give them only lip-service. Basically, they do not exist to the universal point where it can be said that every man is a brother of the next. If they did, there would be little unrest in the world and rare cause for strife in the United States.

Of course there have been efforts made to produce this idealistic condition but the present state of world and national affairs is shocking proof that the attempts have not been of sufficient strength.

There is the United Nations, world peace organization, striving desperately to improve relations among nations with some measure of success. Yet, the negotiations are carried on by diplomatic officialdom, of necessity weighted down by language barriers and protocol. This is an effort from the outside in, but nowhere is there an organization seeking complete peace where the common, average man - the inner core - is trading his thoughts and hopes and ideals with his counterpart from other sections of this great nation and from other lands - the inside working outward.

Leadership for such an organization is needed and it is obvious that this leadership must come from within the United States, whose constitution and bill of rights are dedicated to a series of fundamental freedoms.

On October 23, 1949, in the tiny town of Aaronsburg, Centre County, Pennsylvania, more than 30,000 people gathered to witness a program whose sole aim was to exemplify the ideals of American freedom as expressed in religious understanding among peoples of all faiths and colors. The Aaronsburg message was heard throughout the United States and in many foreign lands and its success was hailed by participants of representative levels of our populations.

This simple, one-day experiment in a gathering of humans to deal with a vital social problem - groping for the keystone of a stronger America and true world peace - has inspired a project which would turn that event into a perpetual program designed to spread those ideals, working toward heightening the dignity of man and toward eventual understanding so that freedom in all of its concepts comes to America and to the world at large.

Why is Pennsylvania chosen and why the tiny town of Aaronsburg?

It will be remembered that William Penn, a Quaker, came to the New World to escape religious persecution in his native England. Spurred by the hope that men of all faiths could live together in harmony, he founded what later became the great Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, where people then and now worship the God of their choice and pursue their way of life without fear of harm or persecution.

Why Aaronsburg? The town was founded late in the 1700's by Aaron Levy, a Jew who migrated to Philadelphia from Holland for the very same reason as William Penn. He quickly fell into the spirit of this new land of opportunity, when he presented a large tract of land for the erection of the Salem Lutheran Church so that residents of the town named for him, though of a different religious faith, could have a place to worship. He also provided land for a school and a Lutheran cemetery and a gift of pewter communion service still cherished - and in use - by the congregation.

This example - Aaron Levy's unselfish action and the cooperation among peoples of varied faiths to establish a place to worship - led to the presentation of what was to become known as The Aaronsburg Story on that day in 1949, the 150th anniversary of Levy's gift to the Lutherans. There were simple religious and partiotic services, participated in by representatives of every faith and every race. And farmers, laborers, executives, political leaders, the rich and the poor, the young and the aged, rubbed elbows in the day-long migration to Aaronsburg.

Those on the program included such diversified and outstanding leaders as Rabbi Philip Bernstein, United States Mediator Ralph Bunche, General William Donovan, Pakistan Foreign Minister Mohammad Zafrulla Khan, Supreme Court Justice Felix Frankfurter, Rev. Daniel A. Poling, Dr. Abram Sachar, Reverend Frederick Stamm and scores of other prominent clergymen of the various faiths. The theme of the early morning service, three open discussions and a colorful pageant with more than 1,000 men, women and children from this rural area in its cast, stressed America's heritage of religious freedom and understanding as a basic necessity for world peace. Senator James H. Duff, then governor of Pennsylvania who was an active chairman for the program, proclaimed the last Sunday in October as Pennsylvania's Tolerance Day as a result of the program's success. The present governor, John S. Fine, has continued Tolerance Day and has pledged complete support to the ideals of The Aaronsburg Story making available Commonwealth facilities in efforts to perpetuate its message.

A committee composed entirely of residents of Centre County, living within a 30-mile radius of Aaronsburg, handled all the details for The Aaronsburg Story. It is this same group which has conceived and is carrying out the present plans to make Aaronsburg a 365-day-a-year working shrine dedicated to religious and intellectual understanding.

The perpetuation plan includes:

1. A constant series of meetings for seminars on all phases of the humanities with the single purpose of brotherhood for peace and freedom.

2. An educational program enveloping instruction and learning designed to spread light where there is darkness.

3. An annual pageant to present graphically this historical background of America's freedoms and their role in national serenity and world peace.

The meetings, discussion groups, and seminars, both patriotic in theme as well as religious and embracing all of the humanities, would bring together the representatives of the average American - and later on, peoples from other lands - to exchange knowledge, ideas and projects to strengthen freedom and understanding. There would be meetings of selected groups of clergymen from all parts of the nation, a gathering of youth groups, labor leaders and organizations, industrial representatives and so on into every phase of modern living.

The educational program would include the sponsorship of a chair of learning at the Pennsylvania State College and the provision of many scholarships for special study in all religions and races and human relationships so that educated young Americans would be able to spread the ideals of Aaronsburg. The Pennsylvania State College was selected because of its proximity to Aaronsburg, because of the prominent role it played in the 1949 presentation, and because of its status as a Land Grant College - an institution geared to public service for the average resident of the Commonwealth.

While these projects - the meetings and the educational program - are year-long propositions, it is planned, too, to add a summer presentation of an historical pageant displaying with all the color and imagination of the original effort the story of American freedoms in the graphic manner which often-times is grasped more clearly than are other methods of telling a story, supplementing the academic approach with a visual appeal to the grand masses of people through dramatic representation.

The Aaronsburg perpetuation project is an ambitious one, requiring considerable funds and inestimable planning and plain hard work. Motivated solely by the tremendous objective of creating a better nation and world, all members of the committee are contributing freely of their time and skills and efforts. All faiths are working together on the committee, spurred by the encouragement offered by those who participated in the 1949 Aaronsburg Story, by the hundreds of messages received from parts of the world, and by the realization that here exists an opportunity for a group of average Americans to put into active practice the ideals that all men are equal, that a man is worthy of all the dignities that should be accorded to man regardless of his religious or racial background; that here is a chance to launch "intellectual atomic bombs" to bring about a world truly at peace under the leadership of an America untorn by differences of any origin.

Dear Doctor Mitchell:

I am most grateful to you for the time you gave me to talk about the Aaronsburg Story when I was in Atlanta last week.

I realize the physical and mental effort you must have given to see me then. I hope you've recovered from your trip and our interview.

I thought a great deal about what you said concerning our project, and I believe that ultimately we may be able to align our efforts with those of the Southern Regional Council. Governor Fine will be looking forward to receiving any suggestions you might have for improving our program, as well as the names of any persons to whom you think letters should be sent.

I spent a pleasant hour on Monday with Judge Waring, who wished to be remembered to you.

My dear Governor Fine:

When Mr. Arthur Lewis very kindly came to see me here in Atlanta I promised to write on to you some further people that might well be consulted.

In South Carolina, at Mayesville, Mr. James H. Dabbs. A former professor of English at Coker College who, seven or eight years ago, took up the farming of his ancestral acres. White, liberal, widely respected, excellent writer, courageous, forthright, deeply native. Recent chairman of the South Carolina Division of the Southern Regional Council.

Arkansas--Mr. Ocie Lee Smith. A Negro agricultural official employed in Farmers Home Administration, U. S. Department of Agriculture, Little Rock Office. Widely informed on land tenure arrangements and Negro agriculture in the Arkansas-Mississippi-Louisiana delta region.

Mississippi, at Jackson--The Rev. Mr. H. Brent Schaeffer, a Lutheran minister. White, of exceptional courage. Richly informed about the State.

Tennessee, at Chattanooga--Mr. Alfred Mynders, editor of the Chattanooga Times. Courageous, sensible, hard-driving.

North Carolina, at Durham--Mr. John H. Wheeler, Vice-President, Mechanics and Farmers Bank. A principal Negro official of the great Negro bank in North Carolina. Closely associated with the largest Negro business in the world--North Carolina Mutual Life Insurance Company. Young, able, wise.

Florida--Professor M. A. F. Ritchie, Department of Human Relations, University of Miami, Coral Gables. Expert in these matters.

Louisiana--Mrs. Elsie L. Wilson, Council of Social Agencies, 715 Travis Street, Shreveport. Virginia woman managing the charitable enterprises of Shreveport. Interested in race and human relations and interested in doing something that successfully pulls people along.

Hon. John S. Fine, Apr. 1, 1952

Tennessee, at Knoxville--Mr. Paul Christopher, 216 Flatiron Building, State Director of the CIO. Ablest and wisest leader in thirteen Southern States.

Kentucky--Mr. Edward H. Weyler, Secretary, Kentucky Federation of Labor, Louisville. A good AF of L guy. Runs a workers' education show for the AF of L.

Texas--Mrs. William H. Hogue, 4319 Cherokee Street, Houston 19. A South Carolina lady, long resident in Texas, energetic on matters of race relations. Judicious, brave, effective.

Virginia--The Rev. Mr. Emerson Smith, Department of Interracial Cooperation, Virginia Council of Churches, 109 West Grace Street, Richmond. One of the few paid persons in this field in the whole South. Well informed and brave enough.

Oklahoma--Professor O. D. Duncan, Oklahoma A&M College, Stillwater. Competent and informed sociologist.

I was impressed with the many virtues of the program you have engaged upon.

Respectfully,

George S. Mitchell

Dear Mr. Fleming:

I understand from Doctor Mitchell you'll be with us November 20-22 to work out a program for the Aaronsburg Story. We will be delighted to have you then and are looking forward to meeting you. As Doctor Mitchell no doubt told you, your expenses will be paid by the Aaronsburg Story.

Just as soon as transportation details have been straightened out we'll send them on to you.

November 6, 1952

Dear Mr. Fleming:

I thought you might like to see the list of people who are attending our November 20 Conference, so I am enclosing it.

I had hoped to be able to work out a tentative agenda before the conference, but instead I'm only able to give you a schedule.

First of all, there'll be an informal get-together Thursday evening at the hotel. The real sessions will begin the following morning at 8:30 A. M. at State College, and will continue there until noon. We'll reconvene at 1:30 P. M. at the church in Aaronsburg. This session will be followed by a Pennsylvania Dutch Dinner at the church, where members of the conference will have an opportunity to meet the people of Aaronsburg. We'll adjourn until the following morning at 9 A. M. The conference should be over by noon that day.

I am listing the transportation possibilities. If you intend to fly the nearest accessible airline landing fields are at Lock Haven and Clearfield, Pennsylvania, serviced by All American Airlines, whose flight schedule I've enclosed. If you decide to travel that way we'll be very happy to meet you at either point. Since All American makes rather frequent changes in schedule it might be well to check with your travel agent.

If you expect to travel by train there is service out of Philadelphia on the Pennsylvania Railroad. The Pennsylvania Train 25 leaves North Philadelphia at 9:38 A. M. and arrives at Lewistown at 12:50 P. M. The other train, Number 23 also on the Pennsylvania, leaves North Philadelphia at 4:20 P. M. and arrives at Lewistown at 7:22 P. M. Naturally we'll meet you at Lewistown, the closest railroad point to State College, whenever you arrive. As soon as possible will you let me know how and when you expect to arrive?

We'll be looking forward to seeing you November 20th.

Sincerely,

Arthur H. Lewis

Dear Arthur:

Harold and I have gone through the list. One or two corrections. On list A, No. 18, is properly Carter Wesley, not Wesley Carter. No. 115 (Judge Waring) now lives at 952 Fifth Avenue, New York 21.

A Southern businessman who would be interested and is quite influential in his State is James L. Coker, president of Sonoco Products Company, Hartsville, South Carolina. They make paper supplies for textile mills--cones, tubes, spools, bobbins, etc. Makes a modest annual contribution to SRC and is thoughtful in matters interracial.

Otherwise, the list looks pretty good to me, and I have no one to add.

You might be interested in checking over the names of the members of the new Fund for the Republic of the Ford Foundation. Here they are.

Dear Harold:

I do hope you and Dr. Mitchell are well and not too busy to read the enclosed progress report on The Aaronsburg Story.

As you will note, I've also attached Lists A and B. List A consists of those people to whom Governor Fine originally wrote about The Aaronsburg Story. This list sort of "grew" without any real planning so, I'm certain, additions and perhaps deletions may be necessary. I would very much like to have you go over these and add any names you think should be put there, returning the corrected list to me as quickly as possible. I think that to get 100 distinguished Americans we'll need to ask 200. Incidentally, I've put an asterisk on those I've already seen without necessarily having invited them to the Assembly. Actually, until Governor Fine's formal letter of invitation is sent there will be no real commitments made to anyone.

I'll be looking forward to receiving your suggestions and those of Dr. Mitchell and, perhaps, Mrs. Tilly and any additions you care to make to both lists. I hope to be able to see you between now and the June Assembly.

TO: Members of the National Steering Committee January 22, 1953

FROM: Arthur H. Lewis

SUBJ: Report of Progress on the Activities of the Aaronsburg Story since the November 20th Conference of the National Steering Committee.

I - STAFF

Following the suggestions of the National Steering Committee we have expanded our staff to include the following:

A. Miss Martha Kolodziejski, a permanent secretary, who is running our office, now operating on a full-time basis in the State College Hotel, State College, Pa. (Telephone: 3001 or 6733). Miss Kolodziejski has a wide background in secretarial work and spent two years as a civilian with the Department of Army in Germany.

B. Miss Bruna Norsa, a full-time administrative assistant (B.A., Vassar - M.A., NYU). Miss Norsa is a former Fulbright student, who has a background of research in community living both in Europe and the United States.

C. Mr. Fred Bright of Princeton, New Jersey, is directing field activities of Pennsylvanians (outside of State College) who have evinced an interest in our program to the extent of desiring to contribute funds. Mr. Bright has years of experience in public relations.

D. Mr. Jo H. Chamberlin, Jr., a well-recommended writer (whom most of you met) who has done work for the American Assembly, Columbia University, is operating with us on a part-time basis, and at present, is editing the tape-recording of our November 20th conference. From this and from other information received he will prepare a summary of the activities to date, plans for the future, and publicity material. His first report should be in your hands by February 15th.

II - ASSEMBLY SCHEDULE

The dates of the Assembly are June 19, 20, and 21. I doubt if there will be any change in these, but the following breakdown is subject to some slight variation:

Friday, June 19, 8:00 p.m.	- A plenary session in Schwab Auditorium, State College, Pa.
Saturday, June 20, 9:00 a.m. until noon	- Separate discussions in the 6 areas of exploration.

Subj: Report of Progress on the Activities of the Aaronsburg Story since the November 20th Conference of the National Steering Committee.

II - Assembly Schedule (Cont'd)

Saturday, June 20, 2:00 p.m. until 5:00 p.m.	-	Continuation of separate group discussions in the 6 fields.
" " " 7:00 p.m.	-	Dinner (place undecided).
" " " 8:30 p.m.	-	Plenary session and reports from chairmen of the 6 discussion groups.
Sunday, June 21, morning	-	Voluntary attendance at special church services throughout Centre County.
" " " 12 noon	-	Each distinguished citizen will be a Sunday dinner guest in the home of a resident of Aaronsburg or one of the adjoining communities.
" " " 2:00 p.m.	-	Open-air patriotic ceremony on the grounds adjacent to the Salem Lutheran Church in Aaronsburg and addresses by prominent American citizens.
" " " 4:30 p.m.	-	Adjournment.

III - COMMITTEES

A. National Planning Committee: Father John La Farge (S.J.), with whom I spoke last week, has agreed to accept the temporary chairmanship of our National Planning Committee and is willing to call one, and possibly two, meetings of his group between now and the June conference. He will rely upon the National Steering Committee for completion of detail work and, I think, he expects to meet with this group at least once. He has not as yet selected his committee and on List B, which I have attached, are some suggested names contributed by Father La Farge and others. All on this list are acceptable to Father La Farge. He will welcome additional suggestions from you. From this group he expects to chose about 15, which he says is the largest practicable number for this kind of committee.

B. Invitation Committee: This is a misnomer because actually the invitations will be issued by Governor Fine and the local Aaronsburg Story Committee. However, this "Invitation" Committee, if you recall, is to consist of those distinguished Americans who participated

Dr. Philip S. Bernstein
Dr. Ralph J. Bunche
General William J. Donovan
Senator James H. Duff
Justice Felix Frankfurter
Dr. Charles S. Johnson
Reverend Daniel A. Poling
Dr. Channing H. Tobias

This letter will describe the signatories' reactions to the original celebration and point out the reasons why the spark generated in 1949 should produce a "bright and continuing flame." General Donovan said he would be happy to sign this letter and he feels certain the others will do the same. I have already spoken to Dr. Tobias, Dr. Bernstein, and Dr. Poling, and all have agreed to sign the kind of letter which General Donovan suggested. Dr. Poling also agreed, if requested, to serve on the National Planning Committee. Dr. Bernstein suggested that since the Assembly will convene on a Friday night it might be appropriate to have Jewish religious services at 7:00 p.m. at State College (with voluntary attendance). Within the next 10 days I expect to see the balance of the possible signatories, at least those who are in the United States.

C. National Steering Committee: On Wednesday, January 14th, a few members (those who were available) of this committee met in the offices of the National Urban League in New York. Those present were Julius Thomas, Lester Waldman, Fred Rope and Arthur Lewis. The purpose of this committee meeting was to try to select potential members of the National Planning Committee, the next step to be taken. As you will note by the enclosed List B, we accomplished this task. It was recommended that a report be sent to all committee members. This is it. Those present agreed a further Steering Committee meeting should be held in about a month. The afternoon of Wednesday, February 11th, was set tentatively. The meeting will be in New York, but the place and time will be decided later. All members of the National Steering Committee will be advised so that, if they are available, they can be present. At this next meeting we hope to have the digest of our November 20th seminar, a list of people who will make up the Assembly, a list of members of the National Planning Committee and any additional information we have gathered. We will then prepare the first draft of the agenda for the Assembly to be submitted to the National Planning Committee.

Dear Arthur:

Here are a couple of copies of the January NEW SOUTH on which the NEW YORK TIMES story of February 8 was based. The TIMES story accurately hit the note we wanted: that this is no time for Negro Southerners to coast on their gains in the vote.

Sincerely,

Dear George:

Thank you for your letter of February 9th making a few additions and corrections to our List A. We had a good two-day session on Tuesday and Wednesday of this week in New York, where those members of our National Steering Committee from the area got together. Just as soon as the minutes are typed up, I'll send you a copy.

Incidentally, the New York Times of February 8th, under a Chattanooga dateline, carried your interesting report on discriminatory registration practices in rural areas. Is a full report available? If it is, I'd certainly like to see one and would appreciate your sending it to me.

Again, may I thank you so much for your help.

Sincerely yours,

NATIONAL STEERING COMMITTEE MEETINGS
IN NEW YORK CITY - FEBRUARY 10 & 11

Four members of the National Steering Committee from the New York area and three members of the Aaronsburg Board of Directors attended the meetings. Present on February 10th were: Mr. Albert E. Mingle, Rev. James S. Shannon, Mr. Julius A. Thomas, Mr. Lester J. Waldman and Mr. Arthur H. Lewis. On February 11th, Dr. J. Oscar Lee and Mr. Gilbert W. Stewart, Jr., joined the others.

The following items were discussed.

I. THE THEME OF THE ASSEMBLY

It was suggested that the Assembly adopt as its theme: "Whose Responsibility is Good Human Relations?" This theme should run through the entire Assembly. It would be introduced at the opening session, followed in the panels and discussion groups and again emphasized at the conclusion.

The Assembly will point out that it is the responsibility of everyone to work towards bettering human relations. In addition, the Assembly should try to suggest ways to achieve better human relations in each of the areas considered by the panels and discussion groups. (See IV.)

II. PARTICIPANTS

One hundred "nationally great" figures and 100 "personally great" from Centre County are to participate in the Assembly.

1. The 100 Nationally Great

These are to be selected from existing lists and from such additional suggestions members of the Steering Committee will make. Mr. Lewis is to contact these persons and try to enlist their participation in the Assembly.

2. The 100 Personally Great from Centre County

A. Selection. These are to be selected by a five-member committee from the Aaronsburg Board of Directors, including Mr. Mingle and Rev. Shannon. An attempt should be made to have as wide representation as possible of the social, economic, racial and religious groups in Centre County. Some consideration might be given as to how to make up for such missing elements in the county as Puerto Ricans, Indians, Nisei, etc.

B. Pre-Assembly Briefing and Orientation. It will be important to the success of the Assembly that these representatives of the "average man" take an active part. Many of them may not have been to a conference before. It might therefore be most helpful to have some pre-Assembly briefing and orientation. Two or three members of the Steering Committee might help with these briefing sessions.

II. Participants (Cont'd)

3. Members of Cooperating Organizations

Organizations which have been working with the Aaronsburg Story through a regular representative might be asked to designate other members to attend the Assembly.

4. Additional Participants

A considerable number of unexpected guests might turn up at the Assembly and create problems in connection with available physical facilities. Their attendance at the opening and closing sessions may cause no difficulty, but their presence at the panels and discussion groups will be harder to handle. This is particularly true since these groups will meet in smaller rooms and are likely to be more successful if the number of participants is limited. The problem might be avoided in part at least, if it is made known sufficiently in advance that while the speeches will be open to the public, attendance at the panel and discussion sessions will be limited.

III. MAIN SPEAKERS

1. Opening Session

A. A thirty-minute panel on "I Came to Aaronsburg and I Came Back" was suggested as part of the opening session. Rabbi Philip S. Bernstein, Dr. Ralph J. Bunche, General William J. Donovan, Senator James H. Duff, Justice Felix Frankfurter, Dr. Charles S. Johnson, Reverend Daniel A. Poling and Dr. Channing H. Tobias, who attended the 1949 celebration at Aaronsburg, will be asked to participate in this panel.

B. It was suggested that Dr. Milton S. Eisenhower, president of The Pennsylvania State College, and Rev. Shannon have a part in the opening session.

2. Final Address

A. An attempt should be made to get one of the following to deliver the final address:

President Dwight D. Eisenhower
Harry S. Truman
Adlai Stevenson
Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt

B. The closing speaker, particularly if he is one of the above-mentioned persons, may not have been able to be present at the Assembly during the two preceding days. Therefore, before he speaks, he should be briefed on the previous developments so that his comments will provide a fitting and emphatic closing note to the work of the Assembly.

IV. THE PANELS AND DISCUSSION GROUPS

Although they will not draw as much public attention as a keynote speech, they will be a most important part of the Assembly. It will be in the panels and discussion groups that the more specific work of the Assembly will take place. Suggestions as to ways in which better human relations might be achieved in the different areas will come from these groups which might be expected to contribute towards the formulation of a long-range program for The Aaronsburg Story. There are to be six panel and discussion groups, one for each of the areas suggested at the November conference. They are:

1. Education
2. The Home
3. Economics
4. Governing
5. Worship
6. Recreation

Even though the area covered in each group will be different, each one will have as its underlying theme, the theme of the Assembly. It was suggested that, in accordance with this theme, a uniform set of questions be worked out for each group.

Since there will be some 200 invited participants in the Assembly, approximately 30 persons can be expected to make up each panel and discussion group. This number does not take into consideration such additional persons as may attend the Assembly.

The Saturday morning session should start at 10:00 a.m. instead of 9:00 a.m. as originally scheduled.

1. The Panels

In each of the areas, one or more persons would introduce the subject, touch on a number of aspects of it and raise questions to set off the discussion which will follow.

2. The Discussion

Particularly since many of the persons attending the Assembly may not have had previous discussion experience, the question of getting discussion started, keeping it going and getting wide participation in it, is an important one. It was suggested to have a person experienced in leading discussions present at each group and to make use of special techniques, as the one known as "discussion 66" or "buzz session."

3. Declarations

The suggestion was made that each group, before disbanding on Saturday, select a two or three-man-group of representatives who,

IV. The Panels and Discussion Groups (Cont'd)

3. Declarations together with the representatives of the other five groups would work on a set of declarations. These would be submitted to the Assembly in its plenary session on Sunday.

V. PREPARATION OF WRITTEN MATERIAL IN ADVANCE OF THE ASSEMBLY

The need for written material to send out to the participants well in advance of the Assembly and, perhaps, also to distribute at the Assembly was mentioned but not discussed at the meetings. It will be on the next meeting's agenda.

VI. RECREATION AND SOCIAL EVENTS

A few well spaced events of a recreational and social nature should be fitted into the framework of the Assembly. An informal get-together to "break the ice" was suggested for Friday night. Other suggestions made were: a reception by Dr. Milton S. Eisenhower, a cocktail party for those who may wish to attend, and some professional entertainment.

VII. PHYSICAL FACILITIES

Physical facilities must be planned for well in advance. Dr. Eisenhower has offered to the Assembly the use of such campus facilities it will need. The panels and discussion groups can be held in college classrooms, and the plenary sessions might take place in Schwab Auditorium. Mr. Lewis will attempt to secure the most suitable facilities for each event, taking into consideration the nature of the event and the attendance expected at it.

VIII. COMMITTEES

Some clarification is needed as to the relative functions of the committees which were mentioned in the last progress report and which have a part in the pre-Assembly work.

IX. REVIEW OF ASSEMBLY PLANS

It was suggested that when the plans for the Assembly are more definitely formulated, Dr. Eduard C. Lindeman and Dr. William G. Mather be consulted. Dr. Lindeman is professor of social philosophy at the New School for Social Research and professor emeritus at the New York School of Social Work, Columbia University. Dr. Mather is professor of rural sociology at the Pennsylvania State College. A most active participant in the November conference, he formulated the six areas which will be considered by the panel and discussion groups. Although Dr. Mather will be on a six months' sabbatical in California, Mr. Lewis will contact him by mail and it might be possible to get him to fly back east for a few days to review the plans for the Assembly.

THE GOVERNOR

April 20, 1953

Dr. George S. Mitchell, Executive Director, Southern Regional Council, Inc.,
63 Auburn Avenue, N. E.,
Atlanta 3, Georgia.

Dear Doctor Mitchell:

When Mr. Arthur H. Lewis talked to you about our hopes and plans for perpetuating The Aaronsburg Story as an example of understanding and faith, you expressed interest in the basic idea and in our proposed program. The assurances of cooperation we received from scores of other outstanding Americans and the intense desire these people expressed for a common meeting place is evidence that the goal of higher moral values based on religious understanding can be attained.

The next important step in our program will be reached with the first Aaronsburg Assembly on June 19th, 20th and 21st, 1953. On behalf of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, I extend to you an earnest invitation to be our guest at this meeting which we believe will be most significant in the fight against the forces of evil which threaten our Democracy. Your expenses will be paid by a group of residents of Centre County, Pennsylvania. Excellent hotel accommodations will be provided at Pennsylvania State College (some 20 miles from Aaronsburg) through the cooperation of Dr. Milton S. Eisenhower, president of this institution.

At this Assembly you will be one of a hundred distinguished guests, each a leader in his field, and will join with a hundred "little" people from Centre County who have faith in the principle that a man is a man regardless of his race, his color, his creed or his economic status.

For a week-end the noted and the notable will exchange ideas and trade opinions on the most effective means of creating a climate of equality through understanding. The concepts and policies thus developed will be spread to millions through national press, radio and television coverage.

Mr. Lewis will call you in the near future to arrange for a mutually convenient appointment. He will acquaint you with details of the Assembly and the agenda. In the meantime, I hope you will reserve June 19, 20 and 21 for this important event.

We shall look forward to welcoming you to Aaronsburg.

With best wishes,

Cordially,

April 21, 1953

Southern Regional Council

Dear Dr. Mitchell:

Knowing you share our deep conviction that a man is a man regardless of his religion, his national origin or his color we, the undersigned, urge you to join us in a movement which all of us hope will help preserve our Democracy and perhaps create a world-wide resurgence of faith and belief in the dignity of man.

We are asking for none of your financial support and little of your time. Rather, we would like to have you spend a week-end with us in a small Pennsylvania community this coming summer. We can promise your time will be well spent and could conceivably give new hope to millions of people all over the world who still regard moral values built on a religious foundation as civilization's greatest asset.

The dates are June 19, 20, and 21, 1953 and the place is Aaronsburg, Pennsylvania. The sponsors of the meeting, to be known as The Aaronsburg Assembly, are the Aaronsburg Committee and the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. The purpose of this gathering will be to bring together 100 of America's most distinguished citizens and 100 "little" people, who will sit side by side and develop means to combat the forces of evil which threaten to destroy not only our Democracy but the entire world. Later you will receive a formal invitation from Governor John S. Fine. All your expenses will be paid by a group of residents of Centre County, Pennsylvania. Excellent hotel accommodations will be provided at State College (some 20 miles from Aaronsburg) through the cooperation of Dr. Milton S. Eisenhower, president of this institution.

The village of Aaronsburg, with its Pennsylvania Dutch population of 321, has rich traditions and a colorful background. It was founded in 1786 by Aaron Levy, a Jew, who unable to find enough members of his own faith to form a congregation in the wilderness of Pennsylvania, gave generously of land and money to build a church for his Christian neighbors.

On October 23, 1949, one hundred and fifty years after the Aaronsburg Salem Lutheran Church held its first services, this all white, all Protestant community held a celebration which publicly acknowledged its gratitude to Aaron Levy and pointed out to some 30,000 men and women who came to witness this ceremony a simple, albeit frequently forgotten principle, that it took men of all colors and creeds to build America.

All of us who sign this letter were at Aaronsburg that Sunday, nearly four years ago. We were tremendously impressed by what we saw and heard. We went away with the hope that the powerful energy for good, unleashed here in this rural Pennsylvania community, could somehow be developed into a force for world enlightenment. If that day should ever come we wanted to help and hoped we would be invited to return to Aaronsburg. We have been. We urge you to be with us next June. Later you will receive from Father John LaFarge (S.J.), the temporary chairman of the Aaronsburg Assembly National Planning Committee, an agenda, details of the conference and suggestions for the part we hope you will play at the Assembly.

In the meantime, unless you have already scheduled these dates with appointments you cannot possibly change, please plan to be with us June 19, 20, and 21.

Sincerely,

Philip S. Bernstein

Dear George:

I thought you might be interested in seeing a copy of a letter we received from H. Brent Schaeffer, Pastor of the Wittenberg Luthern Church, Leesville, South Carolina, and a copy of our reply to him. In a letter to Governor John S. Fine you suggested his name as a person to be consulted.

Dear Doctor Schaeffer:

We are in receipt of your very modest letter of April 18th. There was no mistake about the invitation to you. Your name was suggested by Dr. George S. Mitchell, Executive Director of the Southern Regional Council, who said you were "a Lutheran minister, white, of exceptional courage and richly informed..."

Your change of address has been noted. As soon as our agenda has been prepared and a transportation schedule worked out, they will be sent on to you.

Sincerely yours,

Arthur H. Lewis

Dear Mr. Lewis:

Your letter of invitation to attend The Aaronsburg Assembly has been received. I would like to inform you that I am now pastor in Leesville, S. C. I do not know on what basis you selected those to attend the meeting so I felt that I should inform you of my change of address. If that makes any difference please do not hesitate to say that it does and I will think no more of the matter.

I am greatly interested in the project but feel that I am too 'little' to be included. I am sure attendance would not bind one to connection or participation in any future program. If that invitation should be formally issued to me my attendance would be dependent upon ability to make adjustments of our program and working out satisfactory arrangements.

I feel entirely unworthy of your consideration in this worldwide vision and activity and your selection amazes me. The clarification of the above matter will be appreciated.

Sincerely yours,

/s/H. Brent Schaeffer

Dear Arthur:

Many thanks for your letter of June 1. I don't know Mrs. Tilly's schedule yet and doubt that she will go hopping on mine.

I will leave here via Capital Airlines Thursday, June 18, 12:55 p.m., and get into Altoona via Allegheny Airlines at 7:12 p.m., June 18. My present plan is to go to bed in Altoona that night and work my way the next morning over to State College.

I expect I will leave Altoona by Allegheny Airlines Sunday morning and go on over to Washington and then down by train.

Harold Fleming says he can't go, much as he would like to.

Sincerely,

George S. Mitchell
Executive Director

Dear Dr. Mitchell:

Here is the program for the Aaronsburg Story. I tried to figure out some way of getting you into and out of State College at the right time, but it just won't work. As it is, you get there too soon and leave toosoon. If you want to arrive later, you could fly up to Washington 6:35 p.m. Thursday, June 18, spend the night there, and take the 8:10 a.m. train to Lewisburg, arriving at 12:49. They would meet you there and take you over to State College.

Don't know what you want to do about coming back. Maybe you don't think it's necessary for the Sunday program? If you do decide to stay, you could get a plane leaving Altoona for Washington at 8:57 p.m., arriving 10:21. If you do that, you might want to fly back sometime the next day instead of taking the train.

Let me know if you want me to make any changes in your reservations. If I don't hear from you, I'll leave 'em like they are.

Sincerely,

Encls.

TRAVEL INFORMATION

for

AARONSBURG ASSEMBLY

June 19, 20, 21, 1953

Washington, D. C. to State College, Pa.

If travelling by train we would suggest that you take The Metropolitan (Pennsylvania Railroad - #25) out of Washington, D. C. at 8:10 a.m. E.D.S.T. and arriving at Lewistown, Pa. at 12:49 p.m. E.D.S.T. There you will be met and driven to State College. Lewistown is a one hour drive to State College. There are other train connections out of Washington for Lewistown but this appears to be the one which will assure your arrival in State College on Friday, June 19 in time for the opening session.

If travelling by air we would suggest Flight #101 - Allegheny Airlines (formerly All-American) - out of Washington at 8:30 a.m. E.D.S.T. and arriving at Martinsburg Airport (near Altoona, Pa.) at 9:40 a.m. E.D.S.T. There you will be met and driven to State College. Martinsburg Airport is a two hour drive from State College. There is another flight out of Washington to the Martinsburg Airport via Allegheny Airlines but this appears to be the one which will assure your arrival in State College on Friday, June 19 in time for the opening session.

Perhaps you may be motoring to State College. If so, we will be glad to furnish road maps and any other information you may suggest.

Please consult your local travel agent for any change in schedules.

THE AARONSBURG STORY

WHAT IT IS

A DIVERSIFIED group of rural people of Centre County, Pennsylvania, seeking a formula for national serenity and world peace based upon understanding, is attempting to establish a permanent organization designed as a force for good in the United States.

Through discussions and by example, these people hope to point the way toward better understanding in all fields of American life: most specifically in religion, education, economics, recreation, the home, and government.

The basic American freedoms are the keystone of the movement; its foundation is religious understanding: a recognition that fundamentally Americans have faith both in a Supreme Being and in their own way of life.

While similar attempts have been made, The Aaronsburg Story believes that its grass roots efforts, enabling average Americans to sit down for common discussions with leaders in every field—to be heard as well as to listen —may provide a new guide to a better nation.

ITS HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

INSPIRATION for The Aaronsburg Story goes back more than 150 years. It was then that Aaron Levy, a Jewish immigrant from Holland who had extensive land holdings in Central Pennsylvania, gave land to his Pennsylvania Dutch neighbors for their churches, schools, and burying grounds. He also contributed a pewter communion service to The Salem Lutheran Church at Aaronsburg, the town named for him, its founder. The set is still in use.

ITS REVIVAL

LEVY'S thoughtful gift, seen as a perfect example of religious understanding, was commemorated on October 23, 1949, when 30,000 people gathered at Aaronsburg for the 150th anniversary celebration of the Salem Church. They heard talks by James Duff, then Governor of Pennsylvania, Supreme Court Justice Felix Frankfurter, United Nations Mediator Ralph Bunche, and religious leader Daniel A. Poling. They sat down for discussions aimed at broadening religious understanding and they saw a cast of 1000 Centre Countians put on a stirring pageant depicting the story of America's freedoms as reflected in Aaron Levy's contribution. The day's program and its implications in a restless world received national and international applause.

ITS PRESENT

BUOYED by the 1949 success, these people of rural Centre County have invited more than 100 of the nation's outstanding citizens to sit down with them on June 19, 20, and 21 for an Aaronsburg Assembly. From this assembly, it is hoped that there will emerge a definite plan for extending to all peoples of the nation and world a message about the basic design for good living.

ITS FUTURE

AN ANNUAL Aaronsburg Assembly, where different groups can meet to iron out their problems; an educational program in which students may reflect upon the Aaronsburg Ideals; an annual pageant to dramatize this movement; and a concentrated drive to show other communities in America the way to better understanding toward the end that, eventually, "Aaronsburg Stories" may be spread to every town of the country where guidance is needed:

These are the goals of the Aaronsburg Story.

THE AARONSBURG ASSEMBLY

SUGGESTED QUESTIONS FOR PANEL DISCUSSION

LIVING ABOVE OUR PREJUDICES IN RECREATION *

Hamilton Hall- Lounge Room - First Floor

1. What are the manifestations of prejudice in:

   (a) Sports and other forms of physical relaxation;

   (b) Such instruments of mental stimulation as newspapers, magazines, books, theaters, movies, radio and television?

2. To what extent have recreational activities and mass communication enhanced existing prejudices, developed new ones or helped to dispel old ones?

3. What are the responsibilities of mass communication media in regard to perpetuating prejudicial stereotypes?

4. To what extent can we insist on the elimination of prejudices without becoming involved in censorship?

5. What can be done toward finding solutions to the problem of living above our prejudices?

* The American way of life is being made more fruitful by the extension of leisure time to the individual for physical relaxation and mental stimulation. Involved in this leisure time is a greater dependence on the use of a combination of recreational and amusement activities and the mass media of communication.

THE AARONSBURG ASSEMBLY

SUGGESTED QUESTIONS FOR PANEL DISCUSSION

LIVING ABOVE OUR PREJUDICES IN EDUCATING OURSELVES

Thompson Hall - Lounge Room - First Floor

1. What are the prejudices that affect our educational processes in relation to:

   (a) The teaching and learning experience of children, students and teachers;

   (b) The curricula:

   (c) The structure of our educational institutions?

2. How do these prejudices manifest themselves within the educational process and beyond it?

3. What are the devices used to identify these prejudices; what are the devices used to rationalize them?

4. What are the results of these prejudices; i.e.,

   (a) Segregation;

   (b) Attacks on public education;

   (c) Infringement on academic freedom;

   (d) On school appropriations?

5. What can be done toward finding the solution to the problem of living above our prejudices in our educational life ?

THE AARONSBURG ASSEMBLY

SUGGESTED QUESTIONS FOR PANEL DISCUSSION

LIVING ABOVE OUR PREJUDICES IN GOVERNMENT

Hamilton Hall - Recreation Room- Ground Floor

1. What are the prejudices that attach themselves to the institutions of democratic government?

2. How do these affect Americans in their role of citizens, elected officials, partisan politicians?

3. Is the responsibility of the public official to his community's prejudices to:

   (a) reflect them accurately, or

   (b) substitute his own judgment?

4. What are the responsibilities of citizens to eliminate prejudices within government?

5. What solutions can be found toward solving the problem of living above our prejudices?

THE AARONSBURG ASSEMBLY

SUGGESTED QUESTIONS FOR PANEL DISCUSSION

LIVING ABOVE OUR PREJUDICES IN OUR RELIGIOUS LIFE*

Thompson Hall - Recreation Room - Ground Floor

1. What, if any, are the factors in religious life which inhibit the growth of prejudice; what, if any, are the factors in religious life which contribute to the growth of prejudice?

   (a) From the standpoint of the individual religious experience;

   (b) From the standpoint of the institutions of organized religion.

2. How does religious prejudice serve to undermine the American concept of freedom of religion?

3. What is the role of religion in developing human personality and what does prejudice do to human personality?

4. What resources do the institutions of religion have for improving human relations?

5. What can be done toward finding the solutions to the problem of living above our prejudices?

* For the purposes of this panel, we are discussing religion as evidenced in the life of the individual and in the institutions which religions devise, and not the organized systems of religion.

THE AARONSBURG ASSEMBLY

SUGGESTED QUESTIONS FOR PANEL DISCUSSION

Dear Arthur:

That was a grand occasion all around. You must have toiled mightily in the weeks before it, because you were certainly able to stroll through it with a minimum of rufflement. I would have thought that at every second messengers would be plucking your sleeve for the answers to this or that. No, Sir. You sat down and had your luncheon and your supper just like one of the guests! Highest marks to an administrative aide who does his administering weeks before the event.

I don't know when I've had such a good chance to see so many friends and talk with them, seriously and less seriously. For that alone, the trip was a great adventure to me, and the conferences were, I am sure, profitable to many good causes.

I append a sheet which figures out expenses.

Dear George:

Thanks for your very warm letter of June 23. We do feel the Assembly was a success. At least the participants indicated they'd like to do it all over again, perhaps even on a larger scale.

When I see you, and I hope to be able to do that before the winter sets in, I'd like to go over some of the ideas we have for future plans. At the present time, we are preparing the material developed at the Panels. As soon as they are ready we will send them on to you together with a few questions which we hope you will find time to answer.

Enclosed is a check for $102.66 covering the expenses you incurred at the Assembly. I am sorry that this was not made out to the Southern Regional Council as you requested in your letter, but our Treasurer made it out to you instead. If you cannot indorse this over to the Council, please return it and we will have it made out properly. I am sending this one on to you because Ebon Bower, who is a co-signer of our checks, is on vacation and will not return forseveral weeks and I did not want to hold you up.

Please give my very best to Harold and tell him I am very sorry he could not be with us.

Dear Attorney Abram:

At the Executive Committee Meeting at Mammoth Cave, Kentucky, August 18, it was requested that the staff prepare a yearly schedule for executive committee meetings designating both time and place. It was also recommended that more meetings be held away from Atlanta and that two days be provided for the meetings.

In compliance with this request the following schedule has been prepared:

Friday-Saturday	Oct. 28-29	Gatlinburg, Tenn.	(Mountain View Hotel)
Friday-Saturday	Jan. 20-21	New Orleans, La.	(Dillard University)
Friday-Saturday	Apr. 20-21	Atlanta, Ga.	(Atlanta University)
Friday-Saturday	July 20-21	Frogmore, S. C.	(MAW's)

This letter will serve notice of first meeting.

You will be notified of the last three meetings again some weeks prior to each one.

I spent Saturday, May 5th, in Memphis in a Conference on race relations for Memphis and Shelby Counties held at LeMoyne College. Remarkably good people there.

Probably the outstanding member of the Conference was a white lawyer named Grider. I am separated from the program and can't tell you more about it. I believe someone told me that he was with a firm of lawyers of which one Bush is the senior partner.

Dear Adam:

James Dorsey, who has recently resigned as United States District Attorney asked me to go to lunch with him today and outlined to me at that time the following: He has accepted the appointment as the head of the legal committee of Hope, Inc. (the local organization whose purpose it is to preserve public education in the state) and wished me to serve on the legal committee. I informed Mr. Dorsey of the gist of the memoranda which I previously furnished you and he was in thorough agreement with the need for this work to be done as soon as possible. He stated that if this were done, Hope, Inc. would be relieved on two fronts: (1) the materials necessary to plan legal action would be in being when the crisis arose and (2) Hope, Inc. (should it undertake to suggest legal action) would not have to assume the position of raising anything except the funds to prosecute the actions. You understand, of course, that I do not intend to suggest, nor did Mr. Dorsey intend to prejudge, what Hope's role would be in any legal action.

Mr. Dorsey said that I might convey to you his personal feeling that the study projected in my memoranda would be of great practial use to organizations and persons active in the campaign to save public education.

I was glad to have Jimmie Dorsey's views on this as I feel it important for you to know that those who are planning to save public education feel the need for well timed research and study.

Dear Mr. Hero:

I have read the draft proposal for study of the South in World Affairs and particularly Section VI. I think the proposed study would be an important one. I have observed the development of the problem for a long time and have been concerned about it. I have some questions as to the method proposed. I believe, for example, that the same results could be obtained by your sending the draft proposal to twenty-five or thirty lawyers whose names could be furnished by myself and several others, with the request that each of the addressees give you their respective comments and reactions. For example, I could comment at greater length and in more detail on the problem, but perhaps it will suffice for the moment if I put down the following reaction: The political South is growing less internationalist for, inter alia, these reasons:

(1) The central political issue in Southern life is segregation. Southern politicians are willing to trade votes on issues which touch segregation and their natural allies have tended to be political leaders from more isolationist sections of the country. These sections, for example, rural areas of the mid-west, tend to be neutral on the civil rights question, having very few Negro voters, and representatives from these areas will trade votes on the civil rights question for Southern defections from the former internationalist front. Thus, the civil rights - segregation issues poison every aspect of American life, affecting as they do votes on schools, housing, foreign trade and world peace.

(2) The South has tended to be a leadership society, one in which men of prestige and education have tended to control both the formal and informal structures of power - more perhaps than in other sections. Formally, these important persons frequently had strong attachments to a rural economy; today the rural influence has waned. The rural based economy had a free trade orientation. The new economy is more protectionist.

(3) With the development of the Negro vote since the case of Smith v. Allwright outlawing the white primary there has developed an even stronger block anti Negro vote which is composed substantially of under-privileged whites. These people have never had a broad perspective, but formerly they were not strong participants in political life; today, aroused by the Negro vote, they are being heard from. This new group of white voters, in my judgment, do not have strong convictions on the issues of international politics, but office holders fear that they could be easily aroused against "give away" programs and could be quickly prejudiced in a vigorous campaign by rivals for office. Therefore, some very entrenched Southern politicians are very careful not to get in an exposed internationalist position for fear of creating issues in subsequent campaigns.

(4) It is generally recognized that the free trade internationalist position is one which (aside from the group whose economic interests dictate such position) appeals to the best informed and most broad minded segments of American life. This segment is more likely to look at racial questions in a temperate and open minded manner. Therefore, there is no natural affinity between the internationalist leaders and the strict segregationist advocate. It is a rare individual who is open minded on only one subject, except from reasons of pure expediency.

(5) The modern lawyer tends less and less to be an independent advocate. He is more and more becoming the retained instrument of business and financial interests. However well educated and however broad minded he may be, today's successful lawyer is more and more an employee and not a professional person. The day when a successful lawyer such as John Adams could defend the soldiers charged with the Boston massacre is rapidly passing. To tell the truth, it probably has already passed. I think the Southern lawyer of 1960 is just as bright, and certainly a substantial group of them are just as open minded asever. However, they are much more close mouthed. They no longer furnish leadership of which they are capable and which they used to supply in abundance.

I can probably suggest some lawyers who might undertake this project as you have outlined it and will do so if you desire. However, I would certainly find it easier to give you the names of, say, fifteen persons to whom you could send the draft and ask for comment.

I will look forward to your reply.

Sincerely,

Morris B. Abram

Dear Morris:

I was most interested in your letter of April 15. We talked it over at the Research Projects Committee meeting. Augie was having qualms about the study of the costs of discrimination on so narrow a basis. Other members of the committee were still very much interested, but weren't sure where a broader approach would lead. Obviously, we need to get a far clearer view of what the broader approach would be.

I will be in touch with USIA (as a member of the Advisory Commission) on the question of their own attitude. I do not think they would be at all averse to the kind of treatment you suggest, but I do not think it would do much good. I think USIA's handling of racial problems in the United States has been as good as the facts would permit. The trouble isn't with the propaganda, but with the situation which is not nearly as good as you and I want it to be. For USIA to handle it on the broader basis would be of some value, but would also sound a bit apologetic.

I am encouraged, however, that events in South Africa shed a more favorable light on us, and am led to hope that the progressive charge of our revolution will be more fully understood in the world.

I hope to see you at Princeton on May 5, but there is now some doubt as to whether I can make it.

Dear Erwin:

You probably saw Harold Fleming's recent article in the Sunday Magazine of the New York Times. For your convenience, however, I am enclosing a copy of the manuscript. I believe that the ideas presented in this piece are not only valid, but represent an important new approach in explaining America's racial problem to the outside world. Harold is Executive Director of the Southern Regional Council and is, in my opinion, one of the most thoughtful observers and analysts of the Southern scene. From his contact with visitors from non-white countries overseas he has come to have very serious reservations as to the effectiveness of the USIA program in interpreting such incidents as sit down strikes and the Little Rock episode. Some time ago, Harold spoke to Ralph McGill on this point and Ralph seemed impressed and asked Harold to put on paper the substance of his views. I am enclosing a copy of Harold's letter to Ralph in which this was done. When McGill was at my house several weeks ago he indicated an interest in pursuing Harold's ideas.

I seriously doubt that, assuming Harold's thesis is correct, the USIA of its own motion would adopt this new approach. The agency is so closely watched by the Congress and Southern members would be hostile to the idea. However, if the stimulus to adopt such a new approach grew out of a study by a respected national foundation, there might be a re-evaluation of the present program and an adoption of a new approach. Harold Fleming and Ralph McGill would, I believe, be available and willing to make some contribution to such a study and re-assessment. I am writing to you at the suggestion of Augie Heckscher. I hope to see you at Princeton on May 5th.

With kindest personal regards, I am

Sincerely,

Morris

Dear Morris:

As I told you over the phone after my first reading of the Maddox proposal, I think it is good. I have now read it again with the same result. Jim Moss, our Research Director, has also studied it; his enthusiasum is less than mine. Some of his comments I'll try to weave into my remarks that follow. Having said how much I like it, there isn't much else to do except to say what I question or don't like.

Unit I, as described on page four, seems to me necessary, but I hope - out of a long bias against pokey introductions - it will be kept short, literate, and unencumbered by reluctance to lay down conclusions. Maddox notes several times how Units III and IV are to be interrelated; nevertheless, I keep wondering why Units II and III are not combined, in the interest of getting as quickly as possible to the main business, which is Units IV, V, VI. I am sure, however, Maddox has good reasons for his approach and he ought not to be asked to pay much attention to other people's notions of how they would do it.

More substantively, I do have a question about his "hypothesis" on page five. One side of the conflict hypothesized I have no quarrel with; the other side of the conflict is, however, more than new "economic enterpreneurship". I feel justified in urging this point because his framework here is not confined to the economy. The enterpreneurs are, to be sure, of a different breed and function, and this is crucially important. But they have cold war allies: political and moral pressures from outside, a changed agriculture, cultural intergration between the South and the nation, and - most important of all - the Negro movement; etc. Moreover, Moss points out, I think correctly, that the proposal does not explicitly take into account institutional forces of both change and resistance, such as the corporations, unions, and the federal govenment.

To: Mr. Morris Abram

Finally, I have a stand-offish feeling about the study of Negro attitudes proposed on page seven. So much has already been done, I would think enough for Maddox's needs, and a good lot right along the lines he specifically indicates. The one clearly necessary part of this section of the study is the investigation into Negro job training; I am inclined to believe Negro job aspirations and employment "images" are an almost indirect factor of opportunities available for training and employment and will change as those change. My suspicions of the attitudinal study are doubled by the note on page eight that he intends to contract it out. The sub-contracting of bits and pieces of scholarship is a horror which yields only abominations. That last, of course, is a curmudgeonish sort of an opinion; pay it no mind.

This is a highly promising outline. If we can be of any help at any time to Maddox, we'll be most happy to respond.

Sincerely yours,

Leslie W. Dunbar

function, & this is crucially important. into account institutional forces of both change & resistance such as the corporation, unions, and the federal government.

Finally, I have a stand-offish feeling about the study of Negro attitudes proposed on page 7. So much has already been done, I would think enough for Waddel's needs. The one clearly necessary part of the study is the investigation into Negro job training. My suspicions of the attitudinal study are doubled by the note on page 8 that he intends to contract it out. The sub-contracting of bits & pieces of scholarships is a horror which yields only abominations. That, of course, is a curmudgeonly sort of opinion; pay it no mind.

Dear Morris:

I wrote in an article some months ago that the political influence of the rural Black Belt was declining, "and that is good news for the South, and, indeed, for the nation and the whole Atlantic community." I wouldn't quote myself, except as a means of saying how many are in your dubt. My warmest congratulations. You have labored for it a long time, and last week you were matchless.

JEWISH UNIT PICKS NATIONAL LEADER

Morris Abram Is Chosen by Committee on Rights

N. Y. Times 2/16/64

The appointment of Morris B. Abram as president of the American Jewish Committee was announced last night. Mr. Abram, a lawyer, succeeds A. M. Sonnabend, Boston industrialist, who died last Wednesday in Palm Beach of a heart attack.

Mr. Abram, who was the first legal chief of the Peace Corps, becomes the 13th president of the committee, which was founded in 1906 to protect the civil and religious rights of Jews the world over.

Mr. Abram, a native of Fitzgerald, Ga., practiced law in Atlanta until two years ago. He is now a member of the law firm of Paul Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton and Garrison in this city.

Mr. Abram, who had served as chairman of the executive board of the American Jewish Committee, is currently the United States representative to the United Nations Subcommittee on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities.

Morris B. Abram

In this position, he recently submitted a draft convention on the problem of racial and religious discrimination, and he has been active in drawing attention to anti-Semitism in the Soviet Union.

He has served as an attorney in crucial cases dealing with major civil rights and civil liberties issues and was the attorney in a 1962 case before the Federal District Court that struck down Georgia's county unit election system and its denial of voting rights to the people of the state's more populous counties.

Mr. Abram graduated from the University of Georgia and studied at the University of Chicago Law School. He was elected to Phi Beta Kappa and was named a Rhodes Scholar. He earned a bachelor's and master's degree at Oxford University.

During World War II, he served in the Army Air Forces with the rank of major and was awarded the Legion of Merit. He was a member of the American prosecution staff at the Nuremburg trials of Nazi war criminals.

He lives with his wife and five children in Larchmont, N.Y.

Dear Paul:

Will you please enter a gift subscription to New South for Jane Abram (Mrs. Morris Abram); my check is enclosed. Could you begin with the Spring 1969 issue?

Jane also expressed to me a desire to dip into back issues of New South and asked me how to do it. I did not have an answer. Since talking to her it has occurred to me to ask you whether you would want to give her any advice on this point and/or would want to donate as complete a back file as you can make up of New South to Brandeis University library - assuming it would want them. At any rate, whatever thoughts you have please communicate with Jane.

Her address is 4 Willow Road, Weston, Mass. 02193.

Dear Mrs. Abram:

Paul Anthony has referred your letter to our research department. We do have a lot of information on tenant and migrant farmers, and under separate cover, I am sending you some xerox copies of these pamphlets. Also included in the materials I am sending you is a copy of The Migrant Farmers and The Lives of Migrant Farmers. Both were written by Dr. Robert Coles.

I am also sending you a list of books suggested by the National Sharecroppers Fund.

I would like to suggest that you obtain a copy of Landlord and Tenant on the Cotton Plantation by T. J. Woofer, Jr. This book was published in 1936 and should cover the period that you mentioned in your letter.

Thanks for writing, and if we can be of further service, please let us know.

MEMORANDUM

PURPOSE OF MEMORANDUM

Officials and groups who prefer the closing of public schools to the most limited compliance with the orders of Federal Courts in Georgia have been busy for four years researching basic legal principles and constructing their legal positions.

Forces which would preserve public education, however, have had only impromptu legal advice and are fortified in the main only by good intentions and deep convictions.

The legal staff of the NAACP has been hammering at the legal edifice of segregation without regard to the ultimate public consequence of the orders it obtains as a result of its legal victories.

As this is written, in the first days of 1959, Georgia faces the prospect of the obliteration of its public school system which will be drastically impaired even if restored, having been once closed down. The social consequences of the closing of the public schools in Atlanta, or any part of this state, cannot be overestimated. Writing in 1875, George W. Cable, a Confederate veteran, put the issue clearly: "If we withdraw our children from the public schools on the color line, thousands of poor parents will follow the example and their children will go to that school of depravity, the street, whose diploma at best is a shaved head and a striped suit. I would rather pay for schools than prisons, though I and all my kin were childless."

It is now manifest that the public school system cannot be saved, if at all, except by legal strategy - well planned and timely executed. The most responsible and experienced leadership of our state, who live in its great urban areas, no longer have any political influence or control in this emotionally charged area of race. The former influence which the so-called "power structure" exercised in political affairs over the elected representatives and officials of the state has evaporated for two reasons: (1) The elected representatives and officialdom are no longer dependent upon legal retainers and campaign contributions from those who have the greatest financial stake in the preservation of public order, the economy and social stability. These political leaders now have access to the hundreds of millions of dollars generated by new sources of tax revenue, particularly the sales tax, and by the increasing prosperity of the region. Georgia's governors in the 30's had to run the state on a budget of $30,000,000.00. This itself was a strain. Today's governor has well over $300,000,000.00 and there is plenty of latitude for a generousand expansive mood in the operations of this huge business. When dependency ceases, influence is short lived and officialdom is no longer dependent upon the "power structure". (2) Even when the "power structure" influence was at its height, it was reluctant to test it in the field of race relations. Responsible members of the "power structure" who could obtain the adoption of large projects of public improvement with their attendant tax burdens have always been cowed by the prospect of obtaining the slightest advance in the field of race relations. A group who never was daunted by what "they" (meaning the masses) wanted in fields of taxation and public improvement always had a tendency to brush aside any suggestion to change conditions in race status. The answer was always "they" won't let us.

Now it is true that even if the most powerful and influential leaders of the society wish to resist the present trend towards educational suicide, they may be, in fact, powerless to prevent it through heretofore customary channels of influence and control. The channels are closed and the ears are deaf. It is almost as if a whole region were populated by lemmings bound on a mad rush to the sea.

Those with the most to lose in any society are those who possess the most. The closing of the schools will be catastrophic enough. Following this will come a retardation of economic development and conceivably even the dismantling of past gains. Property values certainly will decline, and if public disorder breaks out, the consequences may defy imagination. These are the circumstances which the responsible and conservative forces of every society always fear the most. Generally these forces provide the powerful gyroscope which long in advance of actual necessity steers the ship from such perilous rocks. In the recent past these conservative forces have frequently been critical of the Supreme Court of the United States. Paradoxically they may be saved now only by the intervention of the federal judiciary.

GEORGIA'S LEGAL DEFENSES AGAINST COMPLIANCE WITH FEDERAL COURT ORDERS

Beginning in 1955, three years before the Supreme Court's most recent decision in the Little Rock case, the state's political leaders, on the advice of competent counsel, passed a series of statutes designed to assure segregation in schools in Georgia. The relevant law developed in this field is extracted and appended hereto as Appendix A.

The statutes involved probably have been rendered, at least in part, unworkable by subsequent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. Furthermore, a case now pending before a three judge federal district court in Norfolk, Virginia may establish this principle: that a state may not, under the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment, operate some school systems while others are closed by virtue of a state order entered because other school systems have been desegregated by court decree. This principle, if established, will strike a substantial blow to the probable past plans of Georgia officialdom. However, if all of the Georgia laws designed to operate quasi private schools, or to close one school system and leave the others open, are declared invalid, Georgia will face chaos unless the schools remain open, particularly in the great cities which are immediately threatened.

HOW THE SCHOOLS MAY POSSIBLY BE KEPT OPEN

The schools of this state cannot be kept open by moralizing from the most respected leaders of the state - church or lay. The schools cannot be kept open through the intervention of the "power structure" which has lost (if it ever had) the power to influence this type of decision. The schools will not be kept open by political leaders because of their past promises and for fear of political repercussion from their potential rivals. If the schools can be kept open at all, they will be kept open only by legal processes through the federal court system. These processes can conceivably be employed both as a carrot and a stick. In a sense the stick actually generates the carrot in this case by restricting what state officials can do and by placing upon those ultimately responsible the most unpopular of choices, legal actions can conceivably hold out sufficient inducements to compliance with law and the preservation of public schools. This is particularly so when one considers that under the Alabama school assignment plan only the most token and limited integration would appear necessary at this time.

Atlanta schools will not be kept open if they can be closed without effecting the schools in Ludowici, Mahunta, Irwinton and Villa Rica. Nor will the schools in the state as a whole be kept open if their closing can be layed at the door of the Supreme Court of the United States. The closing of the schools will be unpopular and the only hope for preservation is to put this monkey on the back of those who have willed that it be done rather than give the most token compliance to court decisions.

QUESTIONS THAT NEED TO BE RESEARCHED

The questions which need to be researched are numerous indeed. The writer does not pretend to have any of the answers, he only raises certain questions:

(1) Can the state be enjoined from closing Atlanta's public school system while leaving the public school systems in the rest of the state in full operation?
(a) Can this action be brought as a declaratory judgment (probably not under the limited effect which the Supreme Court has given to the federal declaratory judgment act)?
(b) If this action can be brought only as an injunction, when is the action ripe? In other words, when does an actual case andcontroversy exist? Does a case andcontroversy exist at the present time? One is tempted to say that an action brought now would be premature. Yet, under the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, it is manifest that a city cannot operate segregated schools - Atlanta is. Under the laws of the State of Georgia attached as an appendix, the governor will close the Atlanta schools when they are desegregated. The damage done would be irreparable. The course of events is predictable and certain. Why wouldn't an injunction lie well in advance of the actual desegregation of this schools system and its attendant evils?

(2) Assuming that Atlanta schools are closed by virtue of the system's obedience to the proclamation of the governor, what steps should then be taken to open the Atlanta schools in the event the rest of the schools in the state are operating?

(3) What, if the Atlanta Board of Education, faced with an integration decision from the federal courts, decided to comply? Of course they would risk prosecution, but would a conviction stand?

(4) What if the city decided to use its own revenues and the officials of the city school system were willing to risk prosecution? Could the City Board of Education enjoin the operation of the act which shuts off state funds and compel the payment of those funds? If the state found itself obliged to provide funds to the Atlanta Public School system under such circumstances, does the governor have the power to shut down the public school system of the state under present statutes? If he doesn't what would be the effect of his being obliged to summon the Legislature to seek the power not to close the schools of Atlanta, but to close the schools of Ludowici, Nahunta, Irwinton and Villa Rica and of every other community in the state as well? Would this not put the monkey on the back of those who are responsible for the decision to close the schools?

(5) How will the people of Ludowici feel if their schools are closed in order to "protect" Atlanta, which doesn't want this kind of protection and, further, considering the fact that Ludowici knows that it will not face the prospect of desegregation perhaps for generations?

(6) Suppose the state decides to go out of the education business? Everyone knows this decision, if taken, will be thought to be revocable, but if the school buildings are actually sold, maybe the decision can't be recalled. Maybe the person who bought the school and turned it into a mattress factory won't want to give up a thriving business. What, if anything, can be done to prevent the sale of school property?

(7) To what extent do taxpayers, as such, have an interest in these matters, and in what form can their interest be used to develope a legal strategy?

(8) How can any of the above matters be litigated [illegible] with dispatch? Under what circumstances, for example, can the swift and effective decree of a three judge court be brought into play giving a direct right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States?

(9) How can teachers (and the Georgia Education Association), who wield vast influence, be made effective against the closing of the school system? To what extent will their pensions and retirement system actually be effected by any number of stratagems which the state may take either under existing or future law designed to assure segregated schools?

(10) What, if any, course is necessary to invalidate the so-called private school plan?

(11) To what extent may the mortgage, indenture and bond holders be interested in the developing crisis? Do they have "standing to sue" and in what kind of case?

(12) Is it conceivable that taxpayers may have "standing to sue" and a cause of action when the schools are closed, and considering that a vast part of the tax structure is specifically designed to support the schools? In other words, will officialdom lose by their precipitative action a large share of this $300,000,000.00 a year resource which made them so independent in the first place?

CONCLUSION

The closing of public schools in Georgia cannot be prevented without legal intervention. If once closed, irreparable damage will ensue, affecting the life of every citizen of our state. It would, therefore, appear of paramount importance that those concerned with this problem undertake immediate steps to in some measure provide, insofar as possible, the answers to the questions above raised.

The study that needs to be done must be kept current with legislative developments in the coming forty day session of the Legislature beginning in January, 1959. The study must also be kept abreast of legal developments throughout the region. The project must be a continuing one.

Appendix A

GEORGIA LAWS DESIGNED TO ASSURE SEGREGATED SCHOOLS

The Constitution

The Constitution of 1945 prescribed that separate schools shall be provided for the white and colored races. Ga. Code §2-6401.

Tax exemptions for religious, educational and charitable institutions are not available to nonsegregated institutions. §2-5404.

Statutes

Implementing §2-6401, §32-937 provides that colored and white children shall not attend the same schools, and that teachers receiving or teaching white and colored pupils in the same schools shall receive no compensation from the common school fund.

Expenditure of Funds

Expenditure of state and local funds for any public school system that does not provide separate schools and in which all white and colored children do not attend separate schools, or for payment of any official, teacher or employee working in any manner for mixed schools or classes, is prohibited. §32-801, -804 (1955).

The State Board of Education is prohibited from approving any school budget of any system that does not provide that all expenditures thereunder shall lapse in the event separate schools are not maintained and all white and colored children do not attend separate schools; and no expenditures can be made under any school budget until approved by the State Board. §32-802.

The above two sections do not apply to funds appropriated for capital outlay and due the State School Building Authority and for payment of principal and interest on bonded indebtedness.

In aid of the foregoing any official "in any wise concerned" in spending or using funds in violation of the above, and the sureties on his bond, are personally liable for the amount so spent or used (§32-804), and is further guilty of a felony with sentence of two years imprisonment (§32-9916). The Attorney General has the duty to prosecute, and on direction of the Governor to bring a civil action.

POWERS OF GOVERNOR

The Governor shall proclaim, whenever he shall ascertain any public school system is not entitled to funds, or cannot be operated in such manner as to entitle them to funds under State laws, the closing of such schools and provide for the preservation and ptotection of school properties; the Governor may close the schools of any one city, county, or independent district, or those of several districts, by one order. §32-805 (1956).

The Governor may by proclamation suspend the compulsory school attendance law (§32-2104 (1945) requiring parents to send to school their children between the ages of 7 and 16) over the whole or any part of the State, when in his opinion it is necessary because of riot, insurrection, public disorder, disturbance of peace, natural calamity or disaster, to protect persons or property or to preserve the general welfare of the State.

Grants to School Children

When any school system is closed by the Governor, each child resident of the district, between 6 and 18 who has not completed his education becomes entitled, during the remainder of the year in which the schools are closed and each year thereafter, to receive an educational grant from State and local funds. The grants will be calculated as provided by order of the Governor, who shall prescribe rules and regulations for administration of the grants. They will be paid from

State funds as provided to be expended for individual pupils under appropriations of force for public schools;

Additional amounts as deemed necessary by the Governor, from appropriations made therefor by the General Assembly;

Available Local funds divided among the school children in the district entitled to grants.

Each school district shall have the same power and duty to assess, levy, collect, and spend tax monies for the purpose of making such grants as are provided by the Constitution and laws in respect to public schools. §32-805, -806, -807, -808 (1956).

Note that these grants are to be provided "in discharge of all obligation of the State in respect of education" (§32-805 (1956); the State's "primary obligation" to provide "an adequate education for its citizens" (Const. §2-6401) has never been repealed.

The expenditure of said educational grants, or any portion thereof, by their recipients for religious sectarian education is made a misdemeanor. §32-9917 (1956).

Leases of School Property

The various political subdivisions and governing bodies of school districts and systems have the power to lease for periods up to 5 years any school house or other property for private educational purposes to persons and corporations engaged in the operation of a private school. §32-809 (1956).

Provisions for Teachers

Teachers and school employees covered by any school retirement plan who accept employment in private non-sectarian schools in which students attending the same are eligible for educational grants (by virtue of the public schools they attended having been closed) shall continue to be entitled to benefits provided they continue to make or cause to be made such contributions as would have been required for their benefit had they continued in the public schools. §32-2931 (1957).

The Board of Trustees of the Teachers' Retirement System of Georgia is required to permit private nonsectarian schools and their teachers and employees, upon request, to make contributions to the Teachers' Retirement System and be covered thereby. The State may not make contributions on account of such private school teachers. §32-2901 (as amended 1957).

MEMORANDUM

POLITICAL - LEGAL

The Georgia legislature is now in session. The first four bills introduced by the administration floor leader in the Senate on January 16th were the following:

SB 1. "A bill to implement the power of the Governor as conservator of the peace throughout the State; to define the powers with respect to the operation of public schools; to provide for the closing of public schools; and for other purposes.

SB 2. A bill to implement the powers of the Governor as conservator of the peace; to authorize the Governor to close any school under control of the Board of Regents; and for other purposes.

SB 3. A bill to govern the admission of students to the University of Georgia as to age; to declare exceptions; and for other purposes.

SB 4. A bill to provide for the conduct of certain actions; to provide for the designation of counsel in certain actions; and for other purposes."

The above bills attempt to fortify the state's legal position on the segregation front. It is the hope of the sponsors that Senate Bill No. 1 will discourage white plaintiffs from initiating the Norfolk type federal suit which could close down the school system of the whole state. The thought is that if only one or two white schools are closed (as opposed to the whole system of a city) as, for example, in Atlanta, the parents affected could be offered the facilities of the other white schools, perhaps on a double time basis. This would considerably reduce the wrath and might stave off litigation.

In any event, the administration forces are alert, aware of their problem and are doing considerable planning to meet it.

PLAN OF STUDY

(a) Purpose of Study

The study would be directed towards bringing up together at one place the entire body of statute law (and, in the case of Atlanta, city ordinances) affecting the operation of the state public school system; The methods of taxation relevant to the same; the manner and mode of disbursements of funds; the authorities holding responsibility in the various phases of education (including the disbursement of funds); the provisions with respect to the financing and amortization of the current operations of the state school building authority; also the state judicial authority with respect to the state's operations in the field of public education; the application of the state equal protection clause in this field.

Also, a study of the application of all federal decisions since Brown v. Topeka in relation to the Georgia statutes mentioned above; the investigation of the application of the federal declaratory judgment act and the equity power of the federal court system to prevent or forestall action which, if taken, would be illegal under existing federal decisions in this field; the study of the question of standing to sue and the proper defendants in relationship to any litigation; also, research into the effect of probable state action (under existing statutes) on the teachers pension and retirement system; also, the study of the effect of and probable course of prosecution under existing statutes which make it a felony to operate a school which the courts have ordered to be integrated.

It is obvious that the above questions, upon further examination, will yield many others which would logically need to be included in any comprehensive study.

(b) The Personnel

It is believed that the study would be of sufficient scope that at least three people would be involved, at least one of whom should have considerable experience in federal litigation and who would be knowledgeable in the area of legal stategy and informed as to the political scene. The two other researchers should also be practicing lawyers who have a practical grasp of the application of the academic material. Hence, if the study is to be of practical benefit it will require the time of three practicing attorneys, one of whom should be of senior qualifications. In this respect, it should be pointed out that southern state administrations have for years consistently used top practicing legal talent in developing their strategy in this field.

(c) Time and Cost

It is anticipated that the study will take three months; it is impossible to accurately estimate the number of hours of legal study and group discussion it would consume of the three attorneys involved, but it is perhaps safe to say that this would run between 300 and 500 hours. In addition, there will be an enormous amount of secretarial service required. It is anticipated that this will be furnished by the lawyers participating in the study. It is believed that a minimal compensation for the attorneys would be $7500.00 and compensation for secretarial services for three secretaries who would be involved would be $1800.00. In addition, there would be incidental expenses - telephone, paper and supplies - of not more than $200.00. The total cost of the project would, therefore, be $9500.00.

USE OF MATERIAL

Material produced by the study would obviously be of great practical application. The persons involved, however, would undertake no commitments whatever with respect to their making application of the material. It would be available, however, for such responsible public groups as could use the material for educational or other purposes. Presently two come to mind - Hope, Inc. and The League of Women Voters. They have not been consulted but these are two organizations, for example, which seem interested in preserving public education. There are others and maybe there will be many more as the time for the demise of public education arrives. When that time comes there will be many who will want such material as would be developed in this study, but the material will not be available in time unless it is developed now.

November 20, 1964

Dear Friend:

Members of AEA often suggest the names of people they believe would find the work of the Association and its periodicals interesting and helpful. Your name came to us that way.

I am writing on behalf of the officers and members to extend to you a cordial invitation to join. The enclosed brochure gives some information about the Association and includes a membership application.

Who belongs to AEA? Teachers, businessmen, librarians, labor leaders, social workers, training directors, housewives, county agents, club workers, nurses, home economists, clergymen -- I'll stop there. People join AEA not only because of what they do, but because of what they believe. For the Association provides people with a means of working together to extend opportunities for enriched living to greater numbers of people.

The Association is also a service agency for the field of adult education. Currently it provides the field with information and assistance in carrying out the educational tasks growing out of such critical issues as the War on Poverty, the manpower requirements of the Nation, the need to match the conquest of time and space with a victory over ignorance, prejudice and fear.

You may if you wish subscribe to either or both of the Association's periodicals - Adult Leadership or Adult Education -- without becoming a member. I should add that subscription prices of our periodicals will increase early in 1965, although membership dues will remain the same.

I enclose a self-addressed envelope for your convenience in responding to this invitation. I hope very much to hear from you.

Sincerely,

Eugene I. Johnson

BENEFITS OF THE MOVE

AEA has concluded two major contracts since moving to Washington. One contract is with the Agency for International Development to establish a center for a two-year survey and analysis of adult education activities in Latin America. Under the terms of the contract AEA will organize teams of specialists to survey specific fields of adult education and to make recommendations to AID on adult education priorities. AEA will conduct at least one international conference in a Latin American country to bring adult educators from this country together with ones from Latin America. AEA Executive Director Dr. Eugene I. Johnson (at right in opposite picture) discussed adult education in Latin America with Jack Mezirow (left) of AID and William P. Rogers, U.S. deputy director of the Alliance for Progress, during a recent visit to the State Department.

Under a contract with the U.S. Public Health Service, AEA will survey literature of community development for materials that are relevant to providing health services to people suffering from poverty. It will also conduct a small conference, bringing health and community educators together, to discuss implications of the survey findings for the organization of health services at the metropolitan level. On this contract AEA has been working closely with Daniel Sullivan, of U.S. Public Health Service, shown talking at right about the conference with W. C. Dutton (on left), director of the National Capital Planning Commission and chairman of the National Committee on Urban Life, which will participate in the conference. The NCUL was initiated by AEA's Community Development Section in 1960. AEA's present executive director was its first chairman.

MEETINGS ON LEGISLATION

AEA has been in close touch with proposed legislation and is responding to the challenge of poverty. Attention is particularly paid to educational implications of legislative developments. At a recent breakfast held by AEA to discuss the Adult Basic Education bill, Congressman George E. Brown of California, 10 years a member of AEA, agreed to seek inclusion of the bill, long stalled in the House Rules Committee, in the anti-poverty legislation (Economic Opportunities Act of 1964). Congressmen Brown and Perkins (D., Ky.) accomplished this quickly. With the recent passage of the poverty legislation, the Adult Basic Education program will soon get off the ground. While the University Extension bill is not included, President Lyndon Johnson made a very favorable reference to the need for expanding university extension in a recent talk in California. Meeting in Congressman Brown's office recently were, left to right: Representative Brown; AEA President Crabtree; Hugh G. Pyle, Director of Research for the Continuing Education Service at Pennsylvania State University; and Dr. Blue Carstenson, Executive Director of the National Senior Citizens Council and Chairman of AEA's Legislative Services Committee.

Poverty is more than a matter of economics. Prior to passage of the present bill by the Congress, poverty had become a great national issue. AEA has invited interested national adult education organizations to join in developing a unified response to the poverty program. Twenty four different organizations have participated in discussions to date. Conversations have been held with officials of the major federal departments responsible for important parts of the program. One such meeting was with Hyman Bookbinder, a member of the President's Task Force. Participating in the discussion are, left to right: Thomas McLernon, NEA; Eugene Johnson of AEA; James Quimper, Chairman of the Poverty Committee of the National University Extension Association; Miss Helen Diamond, B'nai B'rith; Edward Brice; Mr. Bookbinder; and Dr. John Holden, AEA President-Elect and Director of the Graduate School, U.S. Department of Agriculture.

OF SPECIAL INTEREST

WORKSHOP

William Patrick, a member of the President's Task Force on the War against Poverty, will be featured at an October 29 Workshop on Poverty in San Francisco now being planned by AEA's California task force in cooperation with the University of California. The workshop will be held immediately preceding the annual conference of NAPSAE. Mr. Patrick will participate in an opening session on community action. Special sessions of the workshop will help adult educators in all areas of the field gear their activities into the developing national program. He is a former City Councilman from Detroit.

NEW BOOK

Adult Education: Outlines of an Emerging Field of University Study, a major work long in preparation by the Commission of Professors of Adult Education, is now at the printers. The book, which will be ready for distribution this fall, contains chapters by various professors. Its preparation and publication were financed by a grant from the W. K. Kellogg Foundation.

FALL CONFERENCE

AEA's Annual Conference will be held in Milwaukee, November 15 through 17. Its theme is Adult Education 1984—A Look Ahead. Dr. Wilson Thiede of the University of Wisconsin is Conference Chairman.

Performing many services for Adult Education in and from the Nation's Capital

THE ADULT EDUCATION ASSOCIATION OF THE U.S.A.

A national membership organization dedicated to service for all programs of education for adults

AEA SERVES THROUGH:

Publications

ADULT LEADERSHIP is a national magazine issued monthly, except July and August, for the benefit of leaders of adult education—whether lay or professional, part-time as of a voluntary organizations, or full-time workers. It is readable, popularly written, and provides a reservoir of ideas and techniques.

ADULT EDUCATION — A quarterly magazine geared to the interests of the professional worker in adult education, dealing primarily with research and theory underlying adult education activities.

Special Publications — Many books, bulletins, news letters and pamphlets of interest in specialized areas of adult education are published. Some are free and others are available at reduced prices to members. Examples of the books published are the 624-page Handbook of Adult Education in the U.S., and Adult Education: Outlines of an Emerging Field of University Study. Examples from an extensive pamphlet series are: How to Lead Discussions, How to Teach Adults, and Working with Volunteers.

Field Service—In this program AEA works to stimulate and coordinate local, state and regional adult education efforts. Valuable manuals on fact-finding conferences and community action have been an outgrowth of this activity.

Legislative Information—A legislative committee, widely representative of adult education, keeps in touch with proposed legislation, informs the membership, and makes recommendations.

Special Projects—AEA undertakes projects for government agencies, foundations, industry and other institutions in which the objectives relate to the special capabilities and goals of AEA. For example, AEA has currently contracted with the Agency for International Development to establish a survey center on Latin America which will gather data, study adult education needs, resources available, carry on analyses, and make recommendations as to the most appropriate and effective programs. In doing so AEA will utilize talent and resources from many adult education agencies.

As another example, AEA provides a means for all interested adult education agencies to join their efforts in a concerted attack on issues of national significance. An adult education task force of 24 national organizations presently works with the President's Task Force on Poverty to draw educational resources more vigorously into the war on poverty.

Conferences—AEA conducts an annual conference, usually combining its efforts with those of other national and local adult education organizations, for discussion of timely adult education topics and issues. Regional and local conferences for specialized purposes are also sponsored.

Clearing House and Consultation Service—From its wide contacts and broad membership resources, AEA is equipped to perform a clearing house function for the whole field of adult education.

Miscellaneous—AEA acts, as the occasion demands, for adult education in U.S.A. on the national and international levels. Other services can include job referrals, reference services, publicity at the national level, representing adult educators and agencies in relations with other national organizations, cataloging research studies in adult education, and preparing a membership directory.

SPECIAL INTEREST SECTIONS

All members of AEA are entitled and encouraged to belong to and participate in one or more of the following special interest sections. Some hold meetings during the year, all meet at conference time and many issue their own publications or newsletters.

AEA MEMBERSHIP

GENERAL MEMBERSHIP: For those interested in the broad concept of continuing education. These members receive Adult Leadership plus all membership privileges.

PROFESSIONAL MEMBERSHIP: For those who teach adults, administrators of extension or adult education programs, and those involved in the professional field of adult education. These members receive Adult Leadership, plus Adult Education, plus all membership services.

CONTRIBUTING MEMBERSHIP: For those dedicated to the cause of adult education and who wish to make a greater financial contribution to it. These members receive regularly both magazines and copies of all new publications, except books, as they are produced, plus all membership privileges.

ORGANIZATIONAL MEMBERSHIP: For schools, libraries, business firms, churches, labor, voluntary organizations and public organizations or agencies concerned about continuing education. These members receive all membership services plus three copies of both magazines and a copy of each new publication except books.

* * * * *

SUBSCRIPTIONS ONLY: If you prefer to receive only the publication Adult Leadership or Adult Education, you may subscribe to either or both of these national magazines by so indicating on the application form.

ADULT EDUCATION

The rate of technical and scientific change, social and economic progress, international developments, and increased leisure time all combine to make continuing education essential throughout life.

Advanced education is becoming the requisite qualification for more and more jobs and occupations, and proficiency in the professions requires constant updating. Government—federal, state and local—is making greater provision for vocational education of adults and for individual development. Industry devotes increased attention to employee education. Of equal importance is adult education which promotes civic consciousness, inculcates in the individual his responsibilities in a democracy, and considers the meaning of life itself and human institutions.

Hundreds of agencies and organizations in the United States are engaged in programs of adult education. It is to provide a focus, a united front to these efforts, and to serve a clearing-house function, that AEA exists. With national offices in Washington, D.C., and with its affiliated state groups, AEA prepares for greater service. It deserves your support and participation.

If you are concerned with any of the following agencies of adult education you should be a member of AEA:

Business and industry, cooperative extension, correspondence schools, evening colleges, government agencies, labor unions, libraries, mass media, men's & women's institutes, music, theater & the arts, public schools, religious institutions, residential schools, social welfare agencies, university extension, voluntary associations & councils, YMCA-YWCA.

Dear Dr. Snider:

As by now is obvious, our hopes for the conference on adult education being held in 1966 are discarded.

Tentatively, we have scheduled this meeting for January 26, 1967. The meeting would be held in Atlanta, running from about 10:00 a.m. to 4:00 p.m. Are you available on that date?

This same letter is being sent to Dr. John O'Hara.

Every good wish to you and your family for the holiday season.

Dear Dr. Smith:

On Thursday, January 26, the Southern Regional Council will hold a meeting of approximately twelve persons to consider what types of programs, if any, an agency like ours can develop to reach and influence public opinion during this serious period of a "backlash."

The meeting will begin at 10:00 a.m., and end about 4:00 p.m. It will be held at the Southern Education Foundation, 811 Cypress Street, N. E., Atlanta, Georgia. We are able to provide travel expenses for persons attending.

Dr. John Griffin has suggested your name as one who could make a valuable contribution to this meeting. We would be grateful if you found it possible to attend.

We will be happy to provide you with a travel advance, and to make hotel reservations for you should you need them.

Food for All

SUITE 535
1346 CONNECTICUT AVENUE, N. W
WASHINGTON, D. C. 20036

May 11, 1970

Ray Wheeler, M.D.
Southern Regional Council
1900 Brunswick Avenue
Charlotte, North Carolina 28207

Dear Dr. Wheeler:

In December, 1969, President Nixon, addressing the White House Conference on Food, Nutrition and Health, said:

> " . . . I commit to your concern the lives of millions of Americans, too young, too old, or too hurt by life to do without your help. I commit to your concern the not less serious task of helping to bring the rest of America to understand what we seek and to join us in adding this new dimension to the concept of American democracy."

The President was talking about improving the food supply of the poor; he was talking about making Federal food and income plans work in every county in America.

There are still over 100 counties in the United States with no food programs whatsoever for their poor; in almost 1,000 of the nation's 3,100 counties, the participation rate of the poor in Federal food programs is less than 33%, even though local authorities claim to have instituted a food stamp or direct distribution program. Many who are served receive inadequate assistance. Over a million school children in poverty have yet to receive their first free or reduced-price school lunch.

With this in mind, seven national non-profit organizations* are approaching the Office of Economic Opportunity to fund a project entitled "Food For All, Inc." This endeavor seeks to utilize the local acceptability of subsidiaries of national non-profit organizations to make food programs work better. Food For All suggests that in those counties and jurisdictions where less than 33% of the poor are enrolled in an adequate food program, the private sector should be brought in to improve the performance of Congressionally approved hunger efforts.

The sponsors of Food For All recognize that their local affiliates do not have influence in all of the hunger-troubled counties of the United States. The sponsors are therefore establishing an Affiliate Council to be made up of national organizations willing to be consulted on how to improve food and income programs in hunger-troubled counties. Food For All suggests that in many of these areas the local subsidiaries of the Affiliate Council members may be able to work with local decision-makers to help make food and income programs serve the poor as Congress intends.

Membership on the Affiliate Council does not commit an organization to any specific course of action. It does, however, represent moral support for the theory of employing the private sector in the alleviation of these poverty-related problems. It does invite inquiries from Food For All to the Affiliate Council members to see if their local subsidiaries, given a small cash grant, can develop local public interest to the point where food and income programs operate properly.

At this time, we formally approach your organization to request that you join the Affiliate Council of Food For All, Inc. To be fair to the many organizations receiving this letter, we ask that you reply, if possible, within thirty days.

Food For All, Inc. -- A Summary

FOOD FOR ALL, INC. - A Summary

Food For All Inc. is a pending non-profit 501(c)(3) organization formed as an amalgamation of existing non-profit organizations interested in eliminating poverty-induced hunger and malnutrition in the United States. Food For All Inc. will use funds from the Office of Economic Opportunity to provide a private thrust into hunger-troubled areas where the present efforts of the Office of Economic Opportunity and the Department of Agriculture seem to be inadequate.

Food For All Inc. is a private-sector effort to act where government seemingly cannot. It will work primarily in counties where the participation rate of the poor in Federal food programs runs from zero to 33%. It expects to go out of business in three years.

Food For All Inc. will be governed by a Board of Directors, seven of whom represent the sponsors* and four of whom represent, insofar as possible, the hungry poor. There will be an Affiliate Council of those non-profit organizations also interested in eliminating poverty-induced hunger and malnutrition in this country. An Advisory Board will ensure that the Board of Directors remains sensitive to local problems.

Food For All Inc. will make grants to local non-profit groups; sufficient flexibility in the national organization of Food For All will be maintained to permit funding through national organizations or directly to non-profit groups of a more regional or local nature.

An incentive reward system will guarantee that the Food For All grantee will keep its interest high during the period of the project.

A major part of this projected effort will be the regular recording of successful and unsuccessful efforts to get food into the mouths of the poor. Those counties today not having valid food efforts despite the authorizations of the Congress and the exertions of the Executive Branch may respond more cooperatively to the efforts of the private sector. If not, we need to know the arguments and the techniques by which such counties and local jurisdictions defy the Congressional and Presidential intent.

Part of the process of persuading a local jurisdiction to feed its hungry will be the identification of those who actually are hungry or malnourished. Identifying such families without immediately feeding them seems immoral. For that reason a major portion of this project shall consist of feeding the hungry poor while they await enrollment in a local food program.

Other local non-profit organizations will be urged to participate in this effort in order that a permanent sensitivity toward the problems of hunger may be left in a local area.

The sponsors, together with the Affiliate Council, represent a broad cross-section of concerned Americans. They have in many cases initiated the hunger and malnutrition fight in this country. It is now time to turn their efforts toward the implementation of programs, designed, as the President stated, "to put an end to hunger in America itself for all time."

Dear Paul:

I have your letter of April 27.

I am enclosing some public interest law firm proposals -- for the Appalachian Research and Defense Fund and the Washington Research Project.

My own feeling is that to be effective, the "public interest law firm" should begin with two full-time lawyers and a "war chest" for litigation expenses, etc. Using the SRC public interest law firm in conjunction with the existing legal resources could spread its impact over a wide geographic area as well as over a wide area of issues.

After you have had a chance to go over some of this material, please call me for I would like to discuss this in some detail. Best personal regards.

Cordially,

Harry

PROJECT PROPOSAL

The Washington Research Project of the Southern Center for Studies in Public Policy

INTRODUCTION

The growth of public policy as a means by which society through government may meet its needs is not a new phenomena. Neither is it only recently that the large government bureaucracy, created to meet the needs of people, has failed to be responsive to those needs. Over 40 years ago, Bertrand Russell commented:

> The first thing to observe is that, in any large organization, and above all in a great state, officials and legislators are usually remote from those whom they govern, and not imaginatively acquainted with the conditions of life to which their decision will be applied. This makes them ignorant of much that they ought to know, even when they are industrious and willing to learn whatever can be taught by statistics and blue books.[1]

It is with this problem and its ramifications that the Washington Research Project (the "Washington Project") of the Southern Center for Studies in Public Policy (the "Southern Center") is concerned. This proposal outlines the Washington Project, a project established principally to develop and conduct educational techniques and activities for students and faculty of Negro colleges in the South for the purpose of conducting studies of public policies at the Federal level affecting indigent Americans.

The Washington Project seeks to fulfill this purpose through the following activities:

[1]Bertrand Russell, Political Ideals, pp. 47-48. (New York: Barnes and Noble, Inc., 1963). (First published, 1917).

a) Involving Negro college students (for academic credit) and faculty in Federal policy planning and implementation on behalf of the poor and providing them specific programmatic outlets, e.g., a research project aimed at a specific policy of the Department of Agriculture;

b) Establishing a permanent academic program utilizing a pre-Washington seminar at Clark College in Atlanta and the students from that seminar in active research at the Washington Project under the daily supervision of a full-time faculty member assigned to the Washington Project;

c) Providing information produced by this educational research to poor communities, community leaders, and organizations regarding available Federal programs and how such programs may be utilized;

d) Involving the students and faculty in the daily activity, ideas, techniques, projects, and goals of the Washington Project Fellows, who will assist the students and faculty of the Southern Center and conduct seminars in Washington and Atlanta, and whose general involvement with the Washington Project will be as follows:

1) Day-to-day persistent policing by specialized persons of selected Federal agency programs to make them responsive to the needs of the poor and minorities;

2) Assisting poor communities and organizations within those communities prepare and process applications for worthwhile projects through the Federal bureaucracy;

3) Serving, through information and counsel, black and Mexican-American elected officials throughout the South and West.

The Project's major educational activities will include the development of a two-semester seminar program for graduate and advanced undergraduate students, with students spending the second semester as student interns with the Project in Washington. The Washington Project will support the development of undergraduate and graduate education at the schools of Atlanta University Center and other educational institutions in the South by providing educational assistance to relevant courses. The research and intern programs will provide significant publications to be used in workshops or conferences for the public and the development of new courses or instruction in existing courses at the Southern Center or the schools of the Atlanta University Center or other educational institutions in the South.

The major research activities of the Washington Project will be directed from its office in Washington, D. C., but it will utilize the resources, coordinated by the Southern Center in Atlanta, of colleges throughout the South. The Washington office is to be staffed by four or five full-time staff members who will hold the joint positions of Fellows and Instructors with the Southern Center. In addition, the Fellows will have the assistance of a full-time instructor in the Washington office.

THE SOUTHERN CENTER FOR STUDIES IN PUBLIC POLICY

The Southern Center for Studies in Public Policy is an academic institution being developed on the campus of Clark College at the Atlanta University Center in Atlanta, Georgia. The Center has been established to develop learning opportunities, utilizing and benefiting the community, for graduate and advanced undergraduate students, for faculty, and for the lay public in understanding and dealing with public policy issues and to service the public by bringing to bear upon these issues the resources developed by the Center through its educational programs.

Planning is presently underway to determine the structure of the Center and the programs it will conduct during the first year of operation. The Washington Project is the first major educational and research program to be undertaken by the Center, and partially forms the base of what will be the major programs of the Center. The Center, including the Washington Project, is being designed to incorporate into its activities seminars, lectures, workshops, conferences, internships, and individually creative basic and applied research projects.

ACADEMIC PROGRAM

General Discussion

The Southern Center for Studies in Public Policy has as its objective inquiry into public policy questions and the preparation of students who will be versed in various aspects of public policy. In addition, of course, the Southern Center operates a Service Center for Elected Officials, primarily Negro elected officials, and does research and publishing. Within the short period of its existence, the Southern Center has already discovered that it is dealing with an area where there is a serious void of black students. The Southern Center also knows that opportunities for black students to experience firsthand the nuances of public policy are limited, particularly insofar as the administration of public programs is concerned. It has been known for some time that public policies have not been responsive to the black and white poor. A great deal of this results from the entrenched bureaucratic procedures at Federal, as well as state, levels.

For these and other reasons, the Southern Center explored possibilities regarding establishment in Washington of a program which would allow students from the six schools in the Atlanta University Center (Atlanta University, Clark, Morehouse, Morris Brown, and Spelman Colleges, and the Interdenominational Theological Center) and other Negro colleges throughout the South to enhance their understanding of Federal policies and their implementation, and consequently develop the kind of expertise that will enable them to be more effective as individuals in influencing public policy. In other words, there is a dire need for more blacks who understand various aspects of public policy and who may choose careers involving them in public problems. In the meantime, it was felt that having students and teachers involved in questions of public policy as part of the teaching and learning experience would also generate greater effort and programs designed to effect public policy to the poor. Overriding all of these objectives is that of continuting research in public policy questions and particularly administrative impediments to full implementation of public policy. This is a vital part of the program and is essential to the academic interest and objectives of the Atlanta University Center.

The Washington Research Project has two distinct instructional components. The first involves seminars with students and faculty members in the schools within the Atlanta University Center. These seminars are designed to prepare students for local internships, as well as internships in the Washington Project office. The second component involves seminars in Washington for the students who will be serving as interns for a semester or a summer or a year. There will be an instructor in Washington who will be responsible for conducting the seminars in Washington. Faculty members at Clark and other schools in the Atlanta University Center are involved in the program of the Southern Center and the Washington Project. Research interest of faculty members in the Atlanta University Center will be utilized by the Washington Project for the purpose of developing empirical data and supportive material on the application of Federal public policy.

Program during the First Two Years

The academic program in the first two years of the project will consist of a two-semester seminar program to be conducted during the first semester at the Southern Center and during the second semester through internships at the Washington Project. Students from these seminars will be eligible for selection as interns during the second-semester seminar in Washington. The program is to get under way during the spring semester, 1969, with the seminar at the Southern Center in Atlanta. The first students to spend time in Washington will come from that seminar, and they will spend the summer in Washington.

The first-semester seminar will serve as an introduction to policy-making at the Federal level affecting the poor through investigation into the needs and demands of the poor, several types of Federal programs, the public policy issues involved in the programs, and the means by which these issues are or might be resolved. The seminar will attempt to develop an understanding of the demands of the poor, to develop some of the principles governing Federal public policy decision-making, and to develop some understanding of different types of Federal programs and administrative structures. As this seminar serves as the basis for the second-semester seminar program in Washington, the types of programs considered will depend to a great extent upon the areas of research being undertaken by the Washington Project and the areas of research in which the students would be involved as interns in Washington.

The second-semester seminar will take place in Washington through the Washington Project. Students from the first-semester seminar at the Southern Center and from similar seminars at other institutions will be selected for assignment as interns to the Washington Project office and assigned a specific research project under the Fellows at the office and under the direction of a part-time instructor hired in Washington for that purpose. In addition, the interns will be given other shorter projects as they develop in the office. The Washington Project has commitments from several members of Congress to place our student interns in a Congressional office for about one month. The Washington Project is also seeking now to place them for a comparable period of time in an administrative agency to permit comparison of the legislative and executive policy-making functions and procedures. The Washington Project will also work to improve student intern research and writing capabilities as well as their ability to analyze selected public policy needs.

The seminar will meet weekly to discuss the research projects being undertaken, the activities of the office, and other matters affecting the formulation of public policy at the Federal level. Also, exposure as far as possible to the problems of the poor and the activities of the nation's capital through luncheons, special visits, and special seminar meetings will take place. The second-semester seminar is intended to involve the interns in the structure and events of the Washington office while maintaining through weekly meetings and other activities the academic background and relevance of the internship experience.

Both seminars will be for credit at Clark College, through Clark at the schools in the Atlanta area, and at other schools throughout the South offering similar first-semester seminars.

Field Research (The Research Assistant Program)

The Washington Project will need accurate factual analysis of specific problem situations involving Federal programs, the collection of accurate data on the utilization and impact of these programs, and special in-depth research on the socio-economic implications. In order to carry out this type of research, the Washington Project will tap the available talent at black colleges and universities and other institutions in the South and Southwest.

Specifically, the Fellows and the Director of Research will identify and define specific areas where follow-up research of a professional nature is required. In addition, an evaluation of collected information and a survey of existing literature might indicate that a specific, long-term study supplying previously unavailable information is needed. The Instructor/Coordinator of the Southern Center will then be responsible for identifying a faculty member or appropriate student at an appropriate campus or with an appropriate organization, depending on the nature of the research required, to carry out the project designed by the Washington Project.

Those persons chosen to undertake these projects will become Research Assistants to the Washington Project as part of its Research Assistant Program. In order to carry out this program, the Instructor/Coordinator will contact the faculties of various campuses, establishing a contact person for each campus responsible for informing the Washington Project periodically of the types of persons available for research assignments of the nature of their interests. On the basis of this survey, stand-by talent will be readily available for the Washington Project research activities.

The Research Assistant Program, in addition to providing valuable data necessary for the Washington Project, will provide meaningful involvement for faculty and students on behalf of the poor and will provide a quantity of quality studies for publication by the Washington Project.

Research Assistants will be paid on a project basis. Their reports will go to Washington for evaluation and use through the Director of Research and to Atlanta for publication and dissemination.

OPERATIONAL ACTIVITIES OF THE WASHINGTON PROJECT

After three and a half years as an attorney with the NAACP Legal Defense and Education Fund, Inc., in Mississippi, with a caseload including many hundreds of demonstration cases, thirty school desegregation suits, selective employment discrimination and welfare suits, and counselling several large antipoverty programs, it became clear to Mrs. Marian Wright Edelman that these efforts alone were, at best, token, and inadequate to meet the needs of the poor. Other efforts had to be made to rationalize, strengthen, and change Federal policy.

To litigate in thirty school districts (at best only half as many could be effectively policed) when HEW Title VI enforcement policy was weak and inconsistent in the remaining ninety Mississippi school districts, was to work around the core of the problem. Only the Federal Government has the capacity to effectuate large scale school desegregation. This is not to disdain the importance of test litigation or of private lawyers in expanding the law's perimeters and pointing the way for governmental action. But the problems of poverty, education, health, and unemployment are not simple discrimination issues, but rather issues of adequate resources and delivery of services requiring massive and coordinated Federal response.

The Field Foundation in January, 1968, provided Mrs. Edelman with a year's fellowship (now extended) to study how an effective structure for representing the poor and minorities which would try to grapple with these problems could be established in Washington with emphasis on:

a) How to make existing Federal welfare, training, job health and education programs available to the poor and minorities on an open and fair basis:[1]

b) How could the poor and black be made more aware of what is available under existing programs and be helped to push projects through the red tape of a complicated Federal bureaucracy;

c) How could Federal administrative agency personnel be educated to the real needs of poor communities and shape policies responsive to their needs;

d) How could an early alert system be established about pending administrative and legislative decisions of vital importance to the poor so as to have an effective input; and

e) What kind of information and thinking about existing programs and new program approaches could be done and presented as reasonable alternative to existing programs.

[1]We feel that if Federal grant-in-aid programs were run effectively and according to the law, vast improvement in the lot of the poor would immediately result. This costs little money and would stop wasting much money now badly spent. For example, Anthony Downs has written that:

> The "poverty gap" derived from the Social Security Administration definition of poverty could be largely eliminated in the United States with only a modest change in the distribution of incomes. That gap has been estimated at $9.83 billion in 1966. This amount is considerably smaller than the annual increase in Federal tax receipts expected to occur in the near future without any rise in tax rates, simply because of the interaction of economic growth and inflation with the progressive Federal rate structure. Hence, if only part of that "national dividend" were devoted to attacking poverty in the next few years by means of larger transfer payments, the entire "poverty gap" could be eliminated without raising tax rates.
> Downs, Who Are the Urban Poor, p. 12.

This has not and is not yet being effectively or systematically done by any group, and it is a crying need. Traditional civil rights groups rally around large legislative issues of simple discrimination, but once a law is on the books, the implementation of that law has been largely ignored. This has been unfortunate, as often the guidelines drafted for implementation of a given law are as crucial as the law itself. Moreover, strong enforcement depends on constant inquiry and pressure.

Too often only those who oppose social legislation are heard and a consistent and intelligent countervoice must be heard. We have been surprised at how often simply a phone call or a visit to a Federal official produces action. This gives that official the excuse that he has been seeking. For now, his action can be justified and defended because he became subject to "public pressure" to act. Additionally, civil rights leaders and poor constituencies often only react rather than propose thoughtful and affirmative action through careful and early suggestions and proposals. If one only reacts, his bargaining position is severely limited. We should be catalysts as well as responders in pushing for more effective Federal policies.

We have no illusions about what is required to do an effective job in this area. It is a slow, tedious, and low-key process. Carefully chosen priorities, thorough research and review of laws, guidelines and policies, and the establishment of a network of contacts and confidences within the agencies, are essential to effectiveness. That this approach can work was reflected in work done in the last weeks of the Poor People's Campaign (the PPC) which began a dialogue with Federal agencies that the Washington Project is continuing.

The PPC came to town with no written demands or agency or legislative strategy. This office attempted to provide these functions by relying on one staff person and an outside network of friendly administrative agency people. After a series of demands and visits with agency heads (summary copies are attached as Attachment I), regular meetings were held with various second- and third-level agency personnel (which is where the day-to-day routine work occurs). These meetings attempted to formulate programs and to translate the expressed commitment of the agency to the goals of the PPC into specific agency programs.

Regular consultation and exchanges continue, and some real and constructive changes in Federal policy have resulted. We now have advisory boards of the poor for HUD and HEW health, education, and welfare programs. HEW instituted new guidelines for determination of welfare eligibility by declaration, replacing the cumbersome and degrading earlier procedures for receiving welfare, and additionally agreed to require a hearing, with counsel when requested, prior to termination of welfare benefits. We now have an obligation to train the poor on these boards so that they can exercise their responsibilities well. The hunger issue has been gradually escalated as a result of two years' behind-the-scene efforts of many persons and the PPC, and improvements in the food programs are occurring. It has now become a national issue. Mr. Huge is working closely with local communities and the McGovern Committee on Nutrition and Human Needs in providing witnesses and field information.

The Washington Project is also working generally to:

1) refine and sharpen unmet PPC demands into specific programs directed at the responsible agency;

2) design specific projects; e.g., a hunger cooperative in Mississippi or a storefront health center in a model cities program in Cleveland, as a means whereby agency policy and commitment can be developed and a precedent established;

3) use the PPC constituency and other means to publicize the conditions which an agency has the power to correct, and then pressing that agency to meet the problems thus exposed; (Attached, as Attachment II, are copies of four articles co-authored by Harry Huge of the Washington Project and Dr. Robert Coles.)

4) learn and define the limits of an agency's power, or professed power, to act in a particular area;

5) press for a coordinated agency action--the need for HEW, OEO, Labor, Agriculture to coordinate some of their programs in order to promote a concerted policy in key poverty areas. (Greenville Air Base Project in Mississippi.)

The Washington Project is now preparing a position paper on poverty issues for the next year and is currently holding a series of meetings with Federal agency personnel on the status of current job, welfare, and education programs. We are limiting ourselves to HEW, HUD, Labor, Agriculture, and OEO. Within these agencies, programs will be assessed, and those which are possible to effect and/or are crucial to the poor will be emphasized. We feel it is important to pick out one or two achievable small issues, each year at the same time, we think, and work on larger, long-range issues.

What we feel is unique about the Washington Project is that it hopes to use its resources solely in this area and gain an expertise in Federal decision-making processes. We have a considerable poor, but organized, constituency, particularly in rural Mississippi and South Carolina to which we directly relate. And we are able to draw upon the network of black and Mexican-American elected officials and southern educational resources for two-way input in evaluating Federal programs. Additionally, we will be involved in educating black students in the processes of institutional change and, hopefully, may lead them to new career interests on behalf of the poor.

The Washington Project also will counsel and advise a study of health care to be conducted shortly by the University of California at Los Angeles (U. C. L. A.) and the University of North Carolina. The aim of the study is to examine health care from the standpoint of the patient's problems in obtaining adequate care. The study will include such aspects of the problem as bewilderment about what constitutes good care, when and where to obtain it, and how to pay for it. Procedures to be used in connection with this health care study will be similar to those employed by the Citizens Board of Inquiry, which produced the document entitled HUNGER, U. S. A.

PERSONNEL

The Washington office presently consists of three full-time lawyers, Marian Wright Edelman, Harry Huge, and Ruby Martin. (See attached resumes.) The remaining staff includes two third-year Howard University law students, one research assistant, and two secretaries. In June we will have at least five Negro college student interns from the Southern Center and a full-time research-instructor. Several summer law students will also join us.

We need more staff personnel and are swamped with a number of applications from first-rate people--an Iowa State professor of political science and an expert in farm programs who has worked both in the Department of Agriculture and in the Congress on farm program policy; current clerks to Supreme Court Justices; legislative assistants to various Congressmen; young lawyers from leading law firms; and a ghetto public school teacher-lawyer who would service two decentralizing District of Columbia school areas which have requested our help.

Minimally, we would like to have two additional lawyer-professionals in order that we can have one lawyer assigned to policing each key administrative agency (an ambitious undertaking)--Agriculture, HEW, HUD, Labor, and OEO. These additional professionals should be imaginative and thorough people who have had prior experience either in the subject areas and/or in administrative agencies or the Congress.

Dear Mr. Anthony:

Thank you for your letter of May 15. Food For All is awaiting its final approval in the Office of Economic Opportunity. A large number of organizations have agreed to join in this effort.

It may be several weeks before we can start to provide you with the detailed plan of action of how Food For All and its affiliates can best contribute private services to the elimination of poverty-induced hunger and malnutrition. At that time we will be back in touch with you.

We would appreciate your giving us the name of an individual with whom to communicate in the future on this subject. We would prefer that it be a board member.

Sincerely,

APPALACHIAN RESEARCH AND DEFENSE FUND

(Formerly called APPALACHIAN RESEARCH PROJECT)
Application For Funding

The problems of American society have multiplied at an almost exponential rate in this century. The last few years have witnessed the frustration experienced by existing institutions in trying to deal with them. The 'War on Poverty' and its offspring, the OEO legal services programs, have made bold attempts to deal with the problems of the indigent through traditional forms of legal redress. However, legal aid programs, especially in West Virginia and other Appalachian states, are few in number. Where they do exist, their efforts at reform have been severely hampered by conservative Bar Associations and government restrictions.

If they are inadequate to meet the problems of the poor, legal aid programs which are designed to serve the indigent are even further removed from the problems of the wage earner and the lower middle class consumer. The legal practicioner, with few exceptions, is committed to serving the very interests whose activities as producers, insurers, retailers, creditors, employers, union officials, and polluters are antagonistic to that class of persons technically ineligible for free legal services. This class may be called the 'legally indigent' because their marginal income and assets are too high for representation by legal aid programs, but are too low to secure competant legal counsel. It is this gap between the fact and fiction of 'equal justice for all' that we propose to fill. We propose to serve mainly the legally indigent and the consuming public by the creation of a project which will provide legal counsel, study problems, and advocate change in the 'public interest' to the exclusion of other types of legal representation.

Appalachian Research Project is to be a private, non-profit corporation organized for the following purposes:

To operate exclusively for charitable and educational purposes for relief of the poor and distressed or of the underprivileged and to defend human and civil rights secured by law.

To stimulate public concern about the deep seated socio-economic and non-partisan political problems facing both urban and rural communities of this region and present alternative solutions.

To examine, on a non-partisan basis, local, state and federal legislation and administrative procedures, and to make government responsive to its public constituency.

To mobilize all segments of the community in a common effort to conserve and re-allocate all natural resources of the Appalachian region, and to promote social justice, equal opportunity and individual human rights.

The Appalachian Research Project will initially consist of four attorneys (whose resumes, Exhibits 1, 2, 3 and 4, are attached):

Paul J. Kaufman, Director
John Boettner, Jr.
Naomi Weintraub Cohen
Ray E. Ratliff, Jr.

The staff will provide counsel for legally indigent individuals and consumer groups, study and draft legislation, prepare studies and educational materials on social, legal, economic and non-partisan political problems, sponsor and conduct conferences and seminars to involve student groups and to inform the entire community. In pursuit of these ends, the staff will initially focus on three major areas of interest: 1) Protection of the Rights of Individuals, 2) Protection of the Environment, 3) Education and Training. An analysis of these major areas of interest follows, detailing the staff's contacts both with experts in the problem areas and with affected local community groups.

1) Protection of the Rights of Individuals

A. The W. Va. Black Lung Association, composed of active, disabled and retired miners, has been engaged in a dramatic battle with the coal industry and the state to reform the mine health, safety and compensation laws. The Appalachian Research Project is lending research and legal assistance to this effort.

B. Members of the Association of Disabled Miners and Widows and other coal miners and their dependents have filed an action at law against the U.M.W.A. Welfare & Retirement Fund Trustees and others in the U. S. District Court of the District of Columbia to right serious wrongs perpetrated by the defendants. ARP staff, principally Mssrs. Kaufman and Ratliff, are serving as co-counsel in this action, together with Harry Huge of the Washington (D. C.) Research Project, and Harry Caudill of Whitesburg, Kentucky.

C. About five percent of the state's population, or about 100,000 persons, is black. The very smallness of this proportion has in many instances aggravated employment discrimination. Investigation by the Project should yield objective statistical evidence of the incidence of racial discrimination in employment. The State Human Rights Commission, which is empowered by law to investigate and remedy individual complaints of descrimination in employment and other areas, has been hampered by lack of enforcement powers. The Commission lacks the services of legal counsel necessary to enforce its orders through appropriate court action. The Project proposes to work closely with the Commission and with individual victims of employment discrimination to press their claims beyond the agency level.

D. The staff has numerous community contacts through which actual claims of employment discrimination can be uncovered. Mr. Kaufman, who authored the State Human Rights Law, is counsel for numerous civil rights groups throughout the state. Mr. Boettner has been counsel of record (in his previous capacity as Legal Aid Attorney for The Charleston Legal Aid Society) for various suits by The Triangle Improvement Council of Charleston, W. Va., an organization representing the interests of the Charleston black community. Mrs. Cohen has close contacts with the Mercer County and Summers County N.A.A.C.P., the Mercer County Human Relations Council, and two black church groups (Mt. Zion Baptist, John Stewart Church) in Bluefield, W. Va.

E. Services of the Project staff will also be made available to any individual or organization that seeks the protection of the Federal Civil Rights Act. There is a serious shortage of competent legal counsel available for this purpose in this region.

2) Protection of the Environment

A. Subject to adequate funding, the Appalachian Research Project, in collaboration with the West Virginia University College of Law and the Graduate School of Air Pollution Control, intends to establish and conduct an Environmental Law Center at Morgantown, W. Va. The attached exhibit 5, includes a detailed proposal, letters of intent from the Dean of the College of Law and from the Director of the Graduate School of Air Pollution Control, and a proposed budget explaining this project.

B. The Kanawha Valley, running through the four west central W. Va. counties of Fayette, Kanawha, Putnam and Mason, is a major center for the electric power, chemical, coal, oil and gas industries. The massive assaults on the environment by these industries in this region seriously threaten the health and well being of some 300,000 residents. ARP will resist this onslaught by all legal means.

C. Both Mr. Kaufman (then a state senator) and Mrs. Cohen (then a community organizer) were instrumental in drafting and gaining passage in 1967 of a reasonably good strip mine law for W. Va. The ARP proposes to help affected citizens and groups such as the Citizens Task Force on Surface Mining to explain, enforce and strengthen the law.

D. Insofar as it may aid in better conservation and allocation of natural resources in the Appalachian region, the ARP proposes to review, research and publish materials on land use, planning, zoning and taxation for presentation to educational institutions and to various public bodies.

In summary, the staff of the ARP intends to attack the cluster of issues such as air pollution, water pollution and strip mining which fall within this topic. Toward this end the Project will furnish certain staff services for reputable but underfinanced consumer organizations, already in the field, such as Citizens Air Pollution Council, Congress for Appalachian Development, Public Affairs Conference of West Virginia, and Herbert Hoover Water Pollution Committee of Kanawha and Clay Counties, whose purposes and programs match those of the Project.

Staff personal have been associated with each of these organizations in various capacities. The ARP, in conjunction with several W. V. U. departments will also seek to establish an Environmental Law Center,

3) Education and Training

A. The relative scarcity of legal services programs in West Virginia (two are operating and a third is about to open, serving a total of eight of the State's 55 counties) has caused community action organizations, welfare rights organizations, and poor people's groups to seek alternative ways of meeting the legal needs of the poor. Since December, 1968, Mrs. Cohen and several attorneys from the Charleston Legal Aid Society have planned and conducted lay advocate training programs throughout the state. These training sessions have given community action workers, low income neighborhood residents and welfare recipients instruction in basic legal rights in such areas as public assistance, landlord-tenant law, debtor-creditor law, criminal law and domestic relations. These sessions have included training in the legal techniques of interviewing, investigation, negotiation and advocacy needed by lay persons if they are to serve as effective advocates for the poor.

Mrs. Cohen and Mr. Ratliff have drafted the attached proposal (exhibit 6) to set up a demonstration project which would provide intensive training in the skills of lay advocacy. The Project intends to pursue activities in this area and serve as a training and resource center for groups of lay advocates throughout the state. The staff's activities will include preparation of materials, development of techniques, conduct of actual training programs, and case work supervision.

B. The Project has been asked to undertake the training of community workers to encourage use of skills which have been partly learned in the community under earlier poverty programs.

Since there is no Public Defender Service in the entire Appalachian region, the Appalachian Research Project, as part of its program for the protection of individuals' rights, has such service under consideration. Discussions have been held with both the W.V.U. College of Law and the Kanawha County Bar Association in this regard. A beginning Public Defender Service for a tri-county region would involve expenditures of approximately $50,000 over and above the Proposed Budget, infra; which would be financed by the bar association or by local lawyers.

It should also be noted that the Lay Advocacy Program contemplates the hiring of an administrator, a secretary and travel costs aggregating approximately $17,000, not included in the Proposed Budget.

Finally, there is attached hereto as Exhibit 7, a letter from the Director of the Legal Aid Society of Charleston, evidencing the need for the Appalachian Research Project, and Legal Aid's desire to see it started.

Dear Mr. Gertler:

Mr. Guy Johnson referred me to a letter of July 21. Guy has returned to the University of North Carolina. I succeed him as Executive Director of the Council.

I made note of your address and when and if I get to New York I will try to go to see you.

I have had kicking around for some years a scheme for a movie that I wish you would run through your organization's brains. Here it is:

> White Americans are curious about and, generally speaking, well inclined toward the odd looking outlander from Siam or Kamchatka. When we see queer faces we ask about their national history, and language, religion, culture, costume, and so on.
> Here in our midst we have 15 million people of African descent. We Americans and particularly we Southerners know almost nothing about their African background. Indeed what things we know are misconception, for those who cherished slavery taught us that all Africa was savagery. So why not a movie to awaken and satisfy curiousity about Africa? It ought to show (with considerable use of animated charts): the geography of the continent, the various > racial stocks, tribal migrations, a little about religion, the early kingdoms before the Arab slave raids tortured the continent, and about costumes, tribal organizations and then something about the physical and cultural disorganization involved in the transplantation under slavery.

It may not be believed, but I am satisfied that it is true that your every day white Southerner in his casual contact with Negroes has it in the back of his mind that there before him is a representative of savagery. I believe that a good movie could stimulate in quite a few people interest in the Negro's difficult but honorable history.

I have sent out some feelers on a movie like this once or twice before, but have not had any luck. Are you people a show that might take it up?

Sincerely,

George S. Mitchell
Executive Director

Dear Mr. Johnson:

We have observed with interest and appreciation your activities in the vital field of civic education and intercultural relations. As film producers who have specialized in this area of endeavor we would feel it a privilege to work alongside you in a common program.

With the issue of permanent peace and construction ahead, it may well be that only the quickest and most effective educational means at our disposal will serve our purpose - in time to avoid new conflict.

We are anxious to discuss with you what the film medium can do to reach the millions who are the objects of destructive influences and misinformation, or to convince those in position of responsibility to initiate legislative and community action.

May we have the benefit of a meeting with you in the near future?

Sincerely,

PRODUCERS OF DOCUMENTARY AND EDUCATIONAL FILMS, OFFERING ADDITIONAL SERVICES OF DISTRIBUTION AND AUDIENCE DEVELOPMENT

DOCUMENTARY: In recent years the documentary film—the film that "dramatizes truth"—has taken a forefront place among the lively arts of information. It is now recognized as a powerful instrument of exposition and persuasion.

The World Today is an organization of leading documentary film producers. It has been formed to place their combined skills at the disposal of organizations seeking by dramatic means to increase awareness of the achievement of our times.

PLANNING: The World Today is a group of visual information experts experienced in planning the use of films and graphic materials in the public service.

In collaboration with corporations, institutions, government agencies and international bodies, they have been responsible for the design and execution of large-scale visual information programs in many fields of modern endeavor: world affairs, economics, agriculture, science and technology, industry and labor, health and child welfare, social services and the arts.

PRODUCTION: In developing this integrated approach to visual information, The World Today's producers have explored and mastered new techniques of presentation, ranging from the simplest animated chalk drawings to elaborate sound-color production. In particular, they have specialized in the art of bringing to vital movie life themes often held too difficult or too commonplace for screen treatment.

DISTRIBUTION: The World Today specializes in the development of new audiences. Already, the community film auditorium ranks among the principal public forums of the twentieth century. Everyday, all across the country, groups with the widest interests meet to see and discuss films—business clubs, adult education groups, church societies, consumer organizations, women's clubs, labor groups, and many others. These groups are continually expanding centers for the formation of opinion and the stimulation of action.

Among these great and growing audiences, as among the colleges and schools, the documentary film—the film of fact and idea—is in daily increasing demand. From long contact with the special needs of such audiences, The World Today is in a unique position to arouse their active participation in the topics which its films unfold.

PARTICIPANTS

CHAIRMAN OF THE BOARD

JOHN GRIERSON, long a leader in international education, has been associated with the planning, production and distribution of more than 2000 films in Europe, Canada and the United States. Former Film Commissioner of Canada and Foreign Advisor to the Commission on the Freedom of the Press. Now Advisor on Mass Media and Public Information to the Director General of UNESCO. Introduced the word "documentary" now universally used to describe factual films of educational, scientific and cultural significance.

PRESIDENT AND CHIEF PRODUCER

STUART LEGG has been associated with documentary pictures for more than fifteen years, serving as Producer for Film Center Ltd. and The Strand Film Company of London. In 1939, became Chief Producer of Canadian government films. These included the World in Action series with a theatre audience of forty million per picture, one film winning the Special Academy Award as the best documentary for the year 1942.

EDITORIAL ADVISOR

RICHARDSON WOOD brings to the company a wealth of experience in combining the interests of business development and public enlightenment. As a pioneer in public opinion research and as former Managing Editor of FORTUNE Magazine, he contributes an expert knowledge of dramatic presentation of the problems and achievements of the modern industrial world.

DISTRIBUTION ADVISOR

ARTHUR MAYER well known New York theater operator and Director of Arthur Mayer and Joseph Burstyn, Inc. Former Film Consultant to the Secretary of War and now Public Relations Counsel to the American Theatres Association, he contributes to The World Today Inc. his wide experience of distribution and exhibition in the United States.

ASSOCIATE PRODUCER ABROAD

COMMENTS

JOHN GRIERSON, CHAIRMAN

"John Grierson is one of the wisest and most forward-looking men now putting their minds to motion pictures—and that's a statement which this writer makes out of due and sufficient acquaintance with most of the light and heavy thinkers in the field . . . . He has brought to the screen an aggressive and practical creative mind which has stayed in its comprehensions about five years ahead of the game . . . most of the bigwigs who know him—and just about all of them do—have harked to this canny little Scotsman with respectfully attentive ears."

BOSLEY CROWTHER,
NEW YORK TIMES

"Few can doubt that Grierson is one of the great men of today. He will be known to a later age as an educator who has appreciated the great use to which the mass media of the press, the radio and particularly the film can be put for educational purposes."

LONDON TIMES

"One cinema critic who can also lay claim to being a first-class movie-maker is John Grierson . . . might well call himself the father of the documentary."

TIME MAGAZINE

"It must be eight or ten years since I saw an early, exciting documentary film, "Night Mail." I found this drama more enthralling than nine-tenths of the Hollywood romances. Behind it was a remarkably imaginative man, John Grierson. He and his collaborators—a remarkable group—have done one of the finest mass education jobs on the war and the future in terms of common life, undertaken on this continent."

DOROTHY THOMPSON

STUART LEGG, PRESIDENT

"Stuart Legg, crack documentary film producer and editor in John Grierson's government unit for Canada, has hit the bullseye again . . . an exciting series."

VARIETY

"This cinematic editorial is almost a blueprint of how to make an involved, dull, major aspect of World War II understandable and acceptable to moviegoers . . . the trick is to put the ingredients together to make a picture like 'Food'."

NEW YORK TIMES

"Belongs to that World in Action series which began so auspiciously with Churchill's Island and it sustains the high, exciting standard the first film established." THE NEW YORKER

"They bring a new punch to the screen."

TIME MAGAZINE

"Should be seen by everyone."

WASHINGTON NEWS

"Mark 'em down as a must on your movie list!"

CLEVELAND PRESS

"Completely absorbing!"

SHOWMEN'S TRADE REVIEW

"One of the finest things of its kind ever turned out!"

FILM DAILY

"Excellent. Well deserves the Oscar it won."

THE EXHIBITOR

"Nothing short of superb!"

Dear George:

Your recent letter pertaining to the subject for a film on negro backgrounds was most interesting and welcome indeed.

As you may know, one of the fields which we have been giving a great deal of attention to is that of intercultural relations. We have been interviewing and corresponding with scores of leading organizations the country over who we believe may contribute to a comprehensive intercultural film program by expressing to us their needs in the way of films on topics with which they are concerned and by helping to support such a program financially when a nation-wide survey of needs has been completed. In a recent interview with Dr. W.A.B.DuBois of the N.A.A.C.P. I introduced the general project. I also left with him your proposal as an example of a concrete film subject which they might be interested in backing. Dr. DuBois promised his full cooperation in bringing this to the attention of his group and I hope that they will take some action with regard to a film or a series of films on negro backgrounds.

We are hoping very much that one or several organizations will contribute one or two thousand dollars to help us complete this intensive nation-wide survey, so that we may proceed with production on a well informed basis. You can help our project very much by continuing to send us short outlines of topics which you would like to see produced and distributed in the intercultural field. Also if you have any ideas about where we could pick up a thousand dollars or so to conduct our survey we would be glad to hear about it. In the meantime we are determined to go ahead with the program.

Yours very truly,

My dear Miss Brady,

For a year or so I have been giving an occasional poke to an idea about a movie on the African background of the American Negro. Recently I mentioned the scheme to WORLD TODAY, INC, at 450 West 56th Street, N.Y. 19. They wrote back that something like it might have some sense, but where could they get some money to explore around and see what there was to that and some related ideas they already had.

Yesterday my friend Kendall Weisiger, of Atlanta, told me to write you, and tell you my scheme, which he thought might interest you.

The notion is to take advantage of the natural curiosity we all feel about peoples from outlying places, having the "queer" countenances that originate in Papua or Formosa or Patagonia. We pump such people, when we encounter them, for tales about their language and dress and culture and art and manners, and the more we hear about them, the more we probably like them. Yet here we white people emerge from our front doors and confront in a day down-town a thousand countenances quite different from our own, possessed by people whose forefathers came here from Africa. And we aren't curious, and we ask no questions about Africa, and we don't feel a stir of friendliness. Of course I know that African culture has only the faintest traces left over here, but much that is potentially of the greatest interest transpired in Africa, to and about the Africans whom we see every day.

Couldn't there be a movie - and a longish one that would find a place in regular-run theatres - detailing the African background? Tribal migrations, main language groups, main groupings of physiognomy, culture, history, habits. Plus some of the geography that explains so much about the continent and its people. It could use a lot of footage from older travel films, and would need much animated stuff, with moving arrows to show migrations, and points of geography. I believe some such movie would do a good deal to still the false notion -told us as an excuse for slavery - that all was savagery. And it would give white Americans something to tie back to when they see someone dark with a long head, or a peaked head, or some other distinguishing feature, recognizable as usual in some particular part of Africa. There is also, I believe, much curiosity among Negroes as to what Africa was like, and that could usefully be satisfied.

I am not asking you to finance us in making a film - we couldn't. But I would like to drop the idea into your in-box, and hope that it will get pinned to something else that's similar, and eventually find some usefulness.

The Southern Educational Film Service, at Athens Ga, is mildly curious as to whether the schemhas any value

I send a copy of this to World Today, as reply to their kind letter to me.

Sincerely,

George S. Mitchell
Executive Director

THE INTERNATIONAL CLUB

XXXXXXXXXXXXXX 4, Kort Street,
JOHANNESBURG.

The Southern Regional Council,
63, Auburn Avenue N.E.
ATLANTA 3. Georgia.

28/12/49.

Dear Sirs,

This is an appeal for financial assistance to the Johannesburg International Club. Towards the end of 1948 the Institute of Race Relations took the initiative, found the premises and secured the guarantee of one year's rent from the Bantu Welfare Trust. The Institute's Field Officer, Rev. Basil Holt, seconded to the Institute by the Church of the Disciples of Christ, U.S.A., was given the job of starting the Club and Mr. Darrell Randall, seconded to the Institute for six months by the American Methodist Church, became Honorary Secretary. Through the latter the Club was given a good start and became independent of the Institute which however retains a paternal interest in it.

The object behind the foundation of the Club was to provide a place where persons of all races in South Africa could find a common meeting place where they could learn mutual understanding and tolerance. South Africa is, as you know, a land of racial division and the need for a common meeting place is very great.

The Club provides facilities for teas and lunches, for table tennis and physical training, for concerts, plays and meetings. It also has a library and now a junior section which helps to take Non-European children off the streets. A constitution and sample programmes (printed Free) are enclosed.

The difficulties of financing the Club are great. Much of the conversion of the Club from a warehouse was done by members, and most of the equipment, which is still very inadequate, was obtained in gifts. The membership fees - about £600 p.a. - cannot, even with the very slight profit obtained by the catering, finance current expenditure at present. A statement of income and expenditure is enclosed.

The membership is growing slowly and we hope that in about 3 years to have a membership (all races) of 1200 - 1500, whose fees with the proceeds of various activities and other help will enable the Club to finance itself. In the meantime, the Club lacks the facilities which will quickly bring the membership needed and we will be very grateful if your Council will be good enough to grant it an annual sum for 3 years to help see it through a very difficult initial stage. Human relations are deteriorating so rapidly in this multi-racial society that we feel that every effort must be made to stem the tide of racial antagonisms and hatred. Our Club will do much to help particularly as it is established in one of the storm centres of the Union.

Please help. It is a good cause and more than ever necessary.

Yours sincerely,

THE JOHANNESBURG INTERNATIONAL CLUB.

CONSTITUTION

(Adopted by the Foundation Members Meeting, February 1st, 1949)

1. Name.

The name of the club is the "JOHANNESBURG INTERNATIONAL CLUB", and is hereinafter to be referred to as the "Club."

2. Objects.

The objects for which the Club is formed are:-

(a) To enable people of goodwill of all nationalities, creeds and races to meet one another; to undertake commom cultural activities; to have an opportunity of studying and appreciating each other's several difficulties and to take such steps as may be desirable and practicable to promote racial understanding and harmony, except in so far as certain activities are prohibited in Article 15.

(b) The Club is non-political and shall not be affiliated to any political or religious organisation, group or party. This shall not be a bar to any invitation from the Executive Committee to any person to give an address to the club.

3. Membership.

(a) Membership shall be open under conditions set out below to all men and women of goodwill of the age of eighteen and over.

(b) Foundation Members are those who indicated their intention of becoming members of the Club before the date of February 1st, 1949, and who have duly paid their membership subscription, and whose membership has been confirmed by the Executive Committee.

(c) Ordinary Members (after February 1st, 1949) must be duly proposed and seconded by existing members in writing, and shall be elected by the Executive Committee by at least a two-thirds majority of those present and voting at a duly constituted Executive Committee meeting.

(d) Life Members are those persons who have contributed the sum of £50:0:0 (Fifty pounds) and upwards to the funds of the Club. Life members must be confirmed by the Executive Committee according to the method set forth above for ordinary members.

(e) Members under clauses (b) and (d) shall have no rights over and above those enjoyed by ordinary members in the use of the Club.

(f) The Executive--

(f) The Executive Committee shall have the right to expel or suspend any member if, in the opinion of a majority of two-thirds of those present and voting at a duly constituted meeting, such member contravened the constitution, rules or regulations; or that his or her conduct is found to be detrimental to the interests and comfort of the club, provided that the Executive Committee may re-admit any such person after being duly satisfied that the individual's future conduct will be in accordance with the constitution, rules and interests of the Club. (See also Article 7, clause "d").

(g) Notice that the expulsion or suspension of a member is being considered, shall be on the agenda of a meeting of the Executive Committee and must be circulated to members of the Executive Committee at least 7 (seven) days before the date of the meeting.

4. Annual Subscription.

(a) The minimum ordinary annual subscription shall be one guinea (£1:1:0). Persons willing to pay more than one guinea annually, shall be encouraged to do so.

(b) Students who are unable to afford more may subscribe 10/6d. at the discretion of the Committee.

(c) Payment of subscription in instalments may be made by special arrangement agreed to by the Executive Committee.

5. Visitors and Honorary Members.

The Executive Committee shall make regulations with regard to the introduction of Honorary Members, Temporary Members, and visitors to the Club.

6. Reciprocity.

The Executive Committee shall be empowered to enter into reciprocal agreements with other similar clubs upon such terms as the committee may deem fit.

7. Membership Meetings.

(a) ANNUAL GENERAL MEETING: All members of the Club shall be called together for the Annual General Meeting to be held not later than April 1st in each year, at a time and place to be fixed by the Executive Committee for the purpose of electing the officers and representative members of the Executive Committee for the ensuing year; to receive the report and financial statement on the work of the preceding year; and to consider any business which needs to be brought to the attention of the general membership at that time. Notice of the date of the Annual General Meeting shall be mailed to the members at least three weeks beforehand.

(b) SPECIAL GENERAL MEETING: The Honorary Secretary shall convene a special general meeting at any time on 7 (seven) days notice if instructed by the Executive Committee, or by petition of 25 (twenty-five) or more members of the Club.

(c) QUORUM: The Quorum at an annual General Meeting or a special General Meeting shall be 15% of the paid-up membership of the Club. Should there be no quorum present at such meeting within half an hour after the time set for the meeting, the meeting shall be postponed at least one week and not more than two weeks; should there be no quorum present at such postponed meeting, the business may be transacted by those present, and any decisions taken by a majority of those present shall be deemed to be decisions taken at a properly constituted meeting and shall be binding on the Club. Notice of such a postponed meeting shall be circulated to members on the day following the first meeting at which a quorum was not present.

(d) A properly constituted Special General Meeting or the Annual General Meeting has the power by simple majority, to over-rule any decision or rule made by the Executive Committee, provided that at least 21 (twenty-one) days notice has been given to the membership concerning the proposal.

8. The Executive Committee.

(a) The Executive Committee shall include the following:-

The Chairman

3 (three) Vice-Chairmen

9 (nine) Representative Members, one of whom can be elected as acting-Chairman in the absence of the elected Chairman and Vice-Chairmen.

All the above shall be elected at the Annual General Meeting, as provided for in clauses (b) and (c) below.

An Honorary Secretary and Honorary Treasurer shall be elected by the new Executive Committee, and if not included in the elected members, they shall become ex-officio members of the Executive Committee with the right to vote.

(b) Nominations for Chairman, the three Vice-Chairmen and the nine Representative Members shall be duly proposed and seconded by fully paid members of the Club. Nominations which reach the Secretary 14 (fourteen) days before the date of the Annual General Meeting, shall be circulated to members 7 (seven) days before the date of the meeting. Other nominations of members who are present at the Annual General Meeting may be made from the floor. All members of the out-going Executive Committee shall retire and may be nominated for re-election.

(c) Election of the Chairman shall be by majority vote. The procedure for the election of the three Vice-Chairmen shall be as follows: Members may vote for three candidates only on the list of nominations, and the three candidates securing the highest number of votes will be declared duly elected as Vice-Chairmen. After the above elections are announced, the nine representative members shall be elected by each voter listing the candidates nominated in the order of his or her choice, and the results determined by the Hare system of proportional representation.

(d) Only those members who have paid their subscription for the ensuing year or have paid at least one quarter as an instalment arranged in accordance with Article 4, clause (c) shall be eligible to vote. There shall be no voting by proxy and no member may authorise another to vote on his behalf.

(e) No paid employee of the Club shall be a member of the Executive Committee. When the Club employs a General Secretary, he will be a non-voting member of the Executive Committee.

9. Honorary President and Patrons.

(a) An Honorary President may be elected at the Annual General Meeting.

(b) Patrons and other honorary officers may be elected by the Executive Committee.

10. Vacancies on the Executive Committee.

(a) Vacancies occurring on the Executive Committee between one Annual General Meeting and the next, shall be filled by the Executive Committee and reported to the next Members business meeting.

(b) Any member of the Committee who is absent from three consecutive meetings of the Executive without satisfying the Executive Committee that he had good and reasonable cause shall be deemed to have vacated his seat.

(c) Any member of the committee shall cease to act as such as soon as he ceases to be a member of the Club.

11. Duties of the Executive Committee.

The Committee shall carry out the provisions of this constitution; make the rules for running the club; appoint an Honorary Secretary, Honorary Treasurer, and other honorary officials, and salaried staff, and define their duties. It shall fix meeting procedures, including its own quorum; appoint sub-committees with a member of the Executive Committee as chairman, and have the power of co-option. The Committee may debar any person from attendance at the Club, such person or any person against whom any action is taken by the Committee may appeal to the general membership under Article 7, clauses (b) and (d). It shall be part of the responsibilities of the Executive Committee to see that an active membership is maintained, keeping a reasonable balance in membership among the racial and national groups, keep a record of names, addresses and subscriptions of all members, and do all in its power to promote the welfare of the Club.

12. Trustees.

All the property of the Club shall be vested in the Trustees representing and acting for the whole of the Club membership. No personal liability shall attach to any Trustee except to the extent of such funds of the Club as may be actually received by him. The number of Trustees shall not exceed six nor shall be less than four. The Trustees shall be appointed by the Executive Committee from nominations put forward in writing by members of the Club. The Trustees shall not be office-bearers nor members of the Executive Committee. The Trustees shall remain in office until death or resignation, or until a general Meeting shall think it proper to remove all or any of them. The Trustees shall have the power to make such investments of the funds of the Club as they shall deem advantageous to the interest of the Club.

13. Bank Account and Financial Year.

(a) The Club shall have a bank account which shall be operated by any two of four signatories authorised by the Executive Committee.

(b) All Club income shall be paid into the bank account.

(c) All disbursements shall be by cheque after approval by the Executive Committee, or in case of emergency by two of the four signatories authorised by the Executive Committee.

(d) The financial year of the Club shall end on a date to be determined by the Executive Committee.

14. Audit.

The accounts of the Club shall be audited annually by auditors appointed by the Annual General Meeting of the Club.

15. General.

(a) The Club shall not supply alcoholic liquor to its members nor shall any alcoholic liquor be introduced privately into the Club.

(b) No games of dice or any other games of chance shall be played on the Club premises. The decision of the Executive Committee as to what constitutes a game of chance shall be final.

(c) No dancing shall be permitted at any time on the premises of the Club.

(d) Neither the name of the Club nor its address shall be used as an address on any circular, report, correspondence or document of a business character or for propaganda of any kind, or on any prospectus of a public company, or in any communication to the Press (except official communications on behalf of the Club); nor shall the Club be used by any member as a standing address for business purposes. This rule shall not apply to the official correspondence of the Club nor shall it debar a member or visitor using the Club as a temporary address for personal correspondence.

(e) The Club may be sued and sue in the name of its Chairman, Honorary Secretary and Honorary Treasurer.

16. Amendment of the Constitution.

(a) The constitution shall be amended only by a special resolution passed by a two-thirds majority of those present and voting at a duly constituted Annual General Meeting or a Special General Meeting. At least 21 (twenty-one) days clear notice of the proposed amendment shall be circulated to the members.

NOTES AND COMMENTS

A. OPEN NIGHT.

You will note that certain nights are marked "open" and that is usually on a Tuesday and a Thursday night. This does not mean that the club is closed on those nights. For those who have forgotten Club hours are as follows : Mondays to Friday: 10 a.m. to 10 p.m., Saturdays 10 a.m. to 6 p.m. (except when functions are held on Saturday nights), Sundays 3 p.m.—10 p.m. Quite a number of members only visit the club on those nights when activity is advertised. Don't "visit" the club—treat is as your own and drop in whenever you can. There are always a number of people even on open nights and a great deal of discussion, etc. takes place on these occasions.

B. GENERAL MEETING.

Our first Annual General Meeting is scheduled to take place on Wednesday, March 15th at 8 p.m. Be sure to turn up—at the Gandhi Hall. If you have any ideas about amendments to the constitution, nominations to the committee or any suggestions of any nature concerning the club please send them in early. In terms of the constitution three weeks notice of such meeting must be given and a separate notice will be sent out to members. This is long notice—don't book yourself up for that night.

C. SUBSCRIPTIONS.

Annual subscriptions will shortly fall due—don't wait for the reminder—send that guinea and more immediately and help the club by cutting down on the administrative work.

D. BANQUET.

We have had a terrific response to the Banquet—book your seats early or you'll be out in the cold. For the convenience of those who have not yet booked we have decided to extend the closing date to Tuesday the 14th February.

E. PROGRAMME.

Although attendance has been pretty good at most times there are occasions when very few people turn up. There are probably hundreds of reasons why people stay away—why not tell us why you aren't coming—why not send in your suggestions, criticisms, ideas. We need the ideas our members have—don't keep them to yourself.

F. SATURDAY.

We have started an experiment—keeping the Club open on Saturday nights. Nothing specific is organised for these nights in the sense that anybody is invited to speak or otherwise perform but there is usually some sort of fun and games going on. This series is organised by the Dramatic section for the purpose of raising funds for the Club—come along and enjoy yourself and swell the funds of the Club. Although it is mostly the younger people who turn up, there is plenty of amusement for the oldsters.

SOME OF THE WORK DONE SINCE 1929

- Legal Aid Bureaux for the poor
- Literacy classes for adult Non-Europeans
- Joint Councils for Europeans and Non-Europeans
- Cost-of-living enquiries among Non-Europeans
- Industrial relations enquiries for employers
- Ten-year Plan for Native Education adopted by British Government
- Helped to secure training in South Africa for Non-Europeans as doctors
- First National Nutrition Conference, 1939, leading to State Nutrition Council
- First National Penal Reform Conference, 1945
- 400,000 word Handbook on Race Relations in South Africa
- Regular memoranda & pamphlets bearing on race problems

Dear Sir,

South Africa and its policy towards Non-Europeans has been much in the news over the past year and more. Wide publicity has been given to our racial problems through U.N. and a very considerable interest in South Africa has been in evidence. Your name has been given to this Institute as one who is likely to be interested in, and might wish to support, the work it is doing, and I do hope that when you have read the enclosed pamphlets you will feel that you wish to become a member.

This Institute, which has been in existence for about 20 years, was originally set up with the aim of harmonizing apparently conflicting racial interests. Its policy has been to examine the facts of any particular situation and, paying respect to views sincerely held, to advocate a practical solution. It has built up over the years a wide knowledge of and experience in our racial difficulties and now is regarded not only in the Union but overseas in Britain and America as an authoritative, objectively-thinking organisation. Many eyes are turned to Africa which over the next 50 years will assume greater and greater international importance.

The Institute's publications, written by authorities in the many fields covered by "race relations" are up-to-date, factual and accurate. They will keep you informed of events in Southern Africa.

You may become an Ordinary member for a minimum yearly subscription of £1.1.- (many members, of course, give more(. This entitles you to receive our "Race Relations News" (monthly), "Race Relations" (quarterly journal), the Annual Report (which is in effect a summary of race relations for the year) and, on request, Library and Press Bulletins and Leader Digest. For an additional 10/- a year you may receive other pamphlets of the Institute, as produced, up to that value.

Donor members, subscribing £10.10.- or more yearly receive all pamphlets and publications without additional payment, and I shall be so glad to enrol you in this category.

The need for an organisation such as the Institute is even greater today than ever before and we do most urgently need your support.

May we hope to hear from you shortly?

Yours faithfully,

Ruth M. Neale

SOUTH AFRICAN INSTITUTE OF RACE RELATIONS

WHAT IT IS : WHAT IT DOES

- The INSTITUTE was founded in 1929 as a non-party-political organisation to promote racial harmony between all sections of South Africa's multi-racial society.

- Its membership to-day is more than 3,000 and is drawn from all parts of Southern Africa as well as America and England. The nine leading Municipalities in the Union are affiliated to it, as are missions, churches, Universities, and national organisations such as the Federated Chamber of Industries.

- Through its regular monthly and quarterly publications, and pamphlets in the New Africa and Donaldson Blueprint Series it presents up-to-date documented information, news and views bearing on the complex racial situation.

- In the social welfare and educational fields it initiated such movements as Legal Aid Bureaux for the Poor, Literacy classes for adult non-Europeans, Joint Councils for Europeans and Non-Europeans, cost-of-living inquiries, Penal Reform, Ten-year plan for Native Education, etc., etc.

- It has inaugurated conferences and meetings on race relations, nutrition, industrial relations and prepared detailed memoranda for submission to State Commissions whenever questions affecting black-white relations are involved.

- ITS Information Bureau and Reference Library are at the service of research workers, students, speakers, writers, social workers, etc.

- THE INSTITUTE IS DOING A UNIQUE AND ESSENTIAL JOB IN EDUCATING PUBLIC OPINION INTO THE ACCEPTANCE OF PROGRESSIVE REFORMS YOU CAN PLAY YOUR PART IN THIS NATIONAL WORK BY BECOMING A MEMBER.

LET THEM PLAY

ORGANISED RECREATION CAN HELP TO CHECK CRIME AND MANY OTHER EVILS

PROPER recreational facilities, like proper housing, are conspicuously absent in urban areas occupied by Non-Europeans. Yet we all recognise how much open spaces, sports grounds, clubs, gymnasia, swimming baths and tennis clubs contribute towards diverting our energies into healthy channels.

What then of the many thousands of Non-Europeans in the cities for whom no such opportunities exist? Many youngsters cannot get into school. Libraries, clubs, community centres and playing fields are all too rare ; and where they exist they are usually overcrowded and under-equipped.

What remains? The backyard " beer drink," the gambling dens, the street corners, the shebeens and the rest of slumdom's " amenities."

Healthy Leisure is as Essential as Healthy Labour in Building up National Morale

THE S.A. INSTITUTE OF RACE RELATIONS IS TACKLING THE LEISURE-TIME PROBLEM FROM MANY ANGLES

The Winifred Holtby Memorial Library for Non-Europeans in Johannesburg is one of the few libraries to which they have access. Many more are required.

In the chapter on "Physical Education, Sport and Recreation" in its 780-page Handbook on Race Relations in South Africa, the INSTITUTE quotes the following words of the 1938 International Olympic Committee.

> "For every 1,000 people, there should be provided 5 acres of public playing fields, namely, football, hockey, tennis, athletics, basketball, etc. . . ."

As with other major national issues affecting Non-Europeans the INSTITUTE acts as a constant pressure-group whenever recreational facilities are being discussed. Its main practical work in this connection has been done through other organisations, e.g., Girl Wayfarers, Pathfinder Scouts, the International Club, Bantu Men's Social Centres, the Y.M.C.A., various civic Non-European Affairs Departments and the State Departments of Social Welfare and Education.

Lack of recreational amenities, the INSTITUTE feels, is another link in the vicious chain of circumstances leading to crime, ill-health and anti-social behaviour. In its fight against all these checks on progress, the INSTITUTE looks for support from all South Africans who have vision, faith and conscience.

BY HELPING THE INSTITUTE FINANCIALLY YOU ARE HELPING TO ENSURE THAT OUR COUNTRY WILL HAVE A SETTLED HARMONIOUS FUTURE.

The Reverend Mr. ~~Annoyer~~ Anonye
Livingstone College
Salisbury, N. C.

Dear Mr. Annoyer:

Very nice to have your letter of March 8. I am sorry that the copy I had about me of the Pembroke Progress did not get saved, but the notice was brief though cordial.

My interest is in multiplying examples of just such visits as you made to Red Springs. There are a good many scores of African students at colleges in these southern states.

There are thirty at Atlanta University, ten at Tallahassee, five at Jacksonville, eleven at Bethune-Cookman in Daytona. They came here for a world view, and we are certsinly not getting it to them.

This Council has a good many links with church and university people over the South. I have been trying to think up ways in which to get more speaking engagements for these African young people, and thought, perhaps, you could tell me from your experience the best way to go about it.

Meanwhile, if I get to Salisburg any time soon, I will hope to catch you still there.

Sincerely,

George S. Mitchell

Southern Regional Council

Dear Brother Mitchell:

It was my happy privilege to have had the opportunity of being the recipient of yours of the 7th inst. bearing reference to my appearance at Red Spring,N.C. sometime last month.

I shall be delighted, upon receipt of your own Council's official invitation, to bring to you as I have been bringing to many religious, civic, social, and political groups since upon my arrival in this country, some firsthand information about my country, the land of Stately Palms - Africa.

Any date in April suitable to your Council and at weekend, might be given our serious thought at this end, as soon as we are informed of it. The article, entitled:"Missionary To America," which should be found on Page 132 of enclosed paper, "ONWARD," published by the United Church of Canada, might be of some interest to you.

It has just been sent to the writer from Toronto Canada. The subject of that article was a student at Cornell University, Ithaca, New York, last summer.

Sincerely,

Ofonye

When the Roll is Called Up Yonder - By H. GORDON GREEN

"There with nothing between him and his God he prayed the same thing"

JOHN came down the lane toward the pasture beating time on the side of one rubber boot with a willow gad and singing "When the Roll Is Called Up Yonder." John was letting it out with a little more than the usual swell this morning because it was nearly camp-meeting time and just thinking about camp meeting gave him a certain inspiration. Everyone was going. Well, not quite everyone. Bud wasn't home yet.

When John began thinking of Bud this morning he worried a little. Oh, nothing you could put your finger on. Bud had done very well his first year at college. He had been in the upper ten and the papers had printed his picture for winning one of the scholarships. John was proud and he was glad now that he had finally sold those three Angus heifers for the tuition last fall. But there was just something about Bud's letters of late that made him wonder. He remembered how some of the good folk down at the church had warned him against sending his son to university, especially for a science course. Science, they said, was the plaything of atheists, and a university was a place where young squirts got swollen heads and shrivelled souls. A place where one was taught doubt as a primary fundamental of learning. A place where religion was something you either avoided or studied from a historical or psychological point of view just as you would study an outworn tradition or an interesting superstition. No, there wasn't anything he could put his finger on, but all the same this morning John was asking himself, well, now suppose Bud did get here in time to go to camp meeting. I wonder if he'd come with us.

Well, Bud did come home in time to go to camp meeting. He came tearing in just before dinner in a long, sleek yellow roadster with white sidewall tires like they used to have back in '40 and there was another man and two girls in the car with him. Bud kissed his mother, shook hands with his father, and slapped the rest of the Sunday School class on the back. Then he introduced his friends.

First his new girl. He said, "This is Lucille. I—I guess I told you something about her in my letter. She's the one majoring in sociology, you know. Her father is a professor."

Lucille got out of the car and smiled. "I've heard so much about you. I'm awfully glad to meet you." She said it very sweetly and as if she meant it.

The other couple were the Van Coops, Mr. and Mrs. She was a quick, dark little woman with big eyes that never missed a thing and there was a certain high-nosed quality about her that oozed culture in every gesture. Even in the way she slid out of the front seat.

He was a little fellow with a big mop of hair curling far back and sideburns curling far down and a little baby-coloured moustache. His tweeds were checked, and if that wasn't enough to make you realize that here was an outstanding character, he sported a yellow tie and a lavender silk shirt. John thought he must have been a poet or a philosopher. He was surprised to learn that he was a sophomore at the university.

John wiped his axle-greasy palms on his overalls, shook hands all round, decided to look politely happy and insisted that they all stay for dinner. Things didn't go so badly. Lucille was very easy to talk to, and no one felt that she was trying to put on airs. The dinner was marvellous in spite of the apologies, and everyone said so. And after the meal Lucille insisted on dunking her pretty hands in the dishwater, fingernail paint and all.

John probably would have never brought the subject up. It was Bud who mentioned it after dinner. He said, "Dad, I guess I won't be going to camp meeting with you this year. Van wants me to go up to the lake with them. They have a brand new house trailer up there; you know, one of these big four-wheel tandems. They call her the 'Gipsy Queen.' Got everything in it, gas, electricity, frigidaire, air conditioning, running hot and cold water, shower. Oh, she's a beaut. And there's always a bunch of students up at the lake for vacations. There'll be some real intellects. Not that I wouldn't like to go to camp meeting, Dad. You know."

John said "Oh" with a question mark.

Bud felt the need for further justification. "You see, Dad, I was lucky enough to get that place on the university's geological expedition to Cape Horn. We'll be sailing in September. We'll be gone most of a year, and I think maybe I'm entitled to one really good holiday before I hit the high seas."

John said "Oh" again, this time without the question mark. "Going to be hard seeing you sail, son, but I guess I'm proud anyhow. But I'd still be awful glad to have you with us at camp meeting. Got a couple of good preachers this year—young fellows just out of college—I sort of figured you'd like to meet them."

They had been sitting alone over on one end of the front porch and Van Coops was down on the lawn dismembering the bell of a tiger lily. Suddenly Van caught the drift of the conversation between father and son. Now if there's anything interesting to a non-religious man it is the discussion of religion, and Van promptly dropped the plucked flower and came over.

"I hope I don't appear too uninformed," he said, "but precisely what is a camp meeting?"

John was a little surprised that a man so well educated didn't know what a camp meeting was, but he was too polite to make a crack about it "We go every summer," he said. "They hold it down near London. We take a couple of tents and we camp out with a lot of other good folk in a nice grove near a creek and three times a day we have services. We always manage to get some real good preachers—we go for the kind that's not afraid to tell the truth. And we've always got a lot of good singers and a few guitars and stuff. It's a little different from church. You can let yourself out and sing at the top of your voice."

Van started to laugh. "This is interesting," he said. "Quite a study! Quaint."

John said, "Don't you believe in camp meeting?"

Van laughed in a condescending manner as a sage old man might laugh at a little boy. "As a matter of fact I don't believe much in any sort of religion. It's pretty old-fashioned, you know. . . . Of course, now don't get me wrong. I'm not condemning you for it. My old man is the same way, and I'm not blaming him either. He's had no alternative but to believe just what others have handed down to him. Now at the university we go at things a little differently. We want to have reasons for our beliefs. See? In fact, we don't believe in believing unless we have a reason. Understand what I mean?" His mighty words came smooth and hard and polished.

John was between the devil and the deep blue sea. He wanted to be courteous. He wanted to stand up for his faith. He looked at Bud with mute appealing. Bud should have said something in between. He must have known the hurt that his father felt. But he merely said, "Van's quite a philosopher, Dad. He's pretty shrewd."

John thought of the three Angus heifers and how pretty they would look knee-deep in clover right now, and he thought of the dire predictions of the do-gooders and the "I-told-you-so's" and his eyes began to burn. So did his temper. No, not his temper—his righteous indignation. From now on he was going to answer back.

The sophomore was getting eloquent. He was waving his hands and cocking his head to one side like a goose looking at a hawk. "The trouble is that you have inherited the disastrous trait of believing in the indefinite, the unseen, the unproven. In other words you are subscribing to a form of superstition. Do you plant your oats in the dark of the moon, sir?"

"No, I don't."

"Well, why believe in religion and not in a simple superstition? Have you any more proof for one than for the other?"

"I believe the Bible. I read the Bible. I go to church."

"But you have merely formed a habit, sir. Habits of believing and reading the Bible and going to church. And the reason you think you know, is simply because you have conformed to the pattern of your habits, not because of any reasoning that took place. Let me illustrate. You no doubt went to church last Sunday?"

"Sure I did."

"And you felt refreshed and clean and right with the world. Right?"

"Right."

"Was it because of the sermon you heard?"

"I suppose it was mainly the sermon."

"What was the text?"

John scratched his head, got hot in the face and racked his memory for a full miserable minute and he couldn't remember a thing.

Van turned to Bud with the air of a great man who has just conclusively proven a great principle. "You see? He says the sermon was responsible for his feeling of exaltation and yet he can't recall a thing about it."

John had an answer. "Mr. Van Coops, I can't remember what I had for breakfast this morning either, but I know I was fed."

Everybody let it go at that. John didn't have much chance to see his son in private the rest of that short afternoon. Only when Bud was in the hall getting his jacket for the trip to the lake, did he have a chance to talk to him alone. He said, "Well, son, we'll be gone to camp meeting first thing in the morning, so we won't be seeing you for a while. Have a good time, son. I'd sure like to have a look at that trailer myself." Then he gulped a bit and put his hand on the boy's shoulder and said, "You don't feel that way about religion, do you, son? Like Van?"

Bud fingered the seam of the jacket. His voice was low and just a little sad. "I don't know, Dad. I've got to think it over. I've got to prove a few things for myself. After all, I'm going to be a scientist some day and if I'm going to have a religion it's got to be reasonable. A scientific religion. Try to understand me, Dad, will you? And don't get sore."

John looked down at his shoes. "No, son, I won't be sore. I might be disappointed but I'll never be sore with you. I'll just be praying that you'll come out all right, and I'll always be proud of you."

They stood there for a moment in that awkwardness that men feel when emotion begins to flutter in their speech, and then they went outside to the yellow roadster loading up for the lake.

It was a glorious camp meeting that year. The preachers were full of the spirit of truth and the zeal of their youth. Anointed with fire, John's kind of folk would say. Nor did the day end with the last prayer of the evening service. Long into the night the grove rang with the melody of old-time hymns. Stern, hard-faced, hard-fisted men who would spend the rest of the year in the grey monotony of wrestling with an unwilling earth for a meagre living, suddenly broke out of their shells, improvised quartets and sang till the birds in the trees above them rustled in complaint. This was music.

But John didn't join in many midnight quartets that year. He had a little problem that he and God and nobody else could settle. And after the evening service he secretly drifted away from the grove and down to the loneliness of the creek bank. There, where the songs from the grounds above him melted through the woods just loudly enough to be heard above the frogs, he talked it all over.

"God," he said, "I've got a son. He's a good son, and he could be a lot of use in the world if you'd just let him see a little light. But he's been in with the wrong bunch, Lord, and

The Giant of Lake Ontario

THE sinking sun was turning Lake Ontario into a tossing pot of molten gold as the two fishermen hauled in the last of their nets over the side of their little sailing boat, flicking the wriggling fish from the meshes with deft skill.

The day's catch had been good, and it would bring a high price in near-by York, for the town was crowded in these late fall days of 1814, and there were many mouths to feed.

The man in the stern of the smack gazed eastward as he set the tiller for home, and his eyes widened as he peered across the tumbling water.

"Look, Duncan!" he cried to his companion. "A ship! Can it be that my eyes are playing tricks on me! Surely no vessel as big as that one sails the lake. Look at her!"

He pointed to a huge ship that bore down towards them from the east, her billowing sails catching the last rays of the sun and flinging them across the water. The second fisherman grasped the gunwhale in front of him as he squinted towards the oncoming vessel.

"Ay, Stephen," he replied quickly. "'Tis a big one for sure! Could it be the great St. Lawrence we've all heard about? Wait. . . . let's not go home until we are sure!"

They swung their own craft into the wind, watching the mighty vessel which was rapidly overhauling their tiny smack. Their eyes sparkled as the huge man-of-war drew closer, her high, blunt prow pushing aside the water in long, rolling furrows of foam. Her sides rose from the surface like a towering wall, and her spreading sails seemed to fill the sky. Her masts rose like century-old pine trees, and her beam was more than equal to the length of many a schooner they had seen sail out of Toronto Bay.

"'Tis she!" breathed the second fisherman. "The mighty St. Lawrence! No other ship could be as large!"

"Never have I seen a vessel like her before!" answered the other.

And never again would they see such a vessel on Lake Ontario, nor would any other man who lived before or since, for the St. Lawrence was the largest warship ever to be built on any fresh-water lake in the world, a claim to fame she still holds to this day.

Built in Kingston, then in Upper Canada, to serve as the flagship of Sir James Yeo, Commander of the British Fleet on Lake Ontario in 1814, the St. Lawrence was one hundred and ninety feet long, sixty feet in the beam; and her stem and stern posts were forty feet high. Her main-yard alone used up all the timber of a hundred-foot pine tree, and her two gun decks were pierced for over a hundred cannon.

She carried a thousand men, and her anchors, capstans, rope and fittings came from the finest naval yards of Great Britain, brought three thousand miles across the Atlantic, and hauled up the St. Lawrence River in big, flat-bottomed Durham boats.

Like so many other precious relics of Canada's early years, the St. Lawrence has long since disappeared, but her picture is a treasure of the John Ross Robertson collection in the Toronto Public Library, where Canadians may see today how the greatest warship ever to sail a fresh-water lake once appeared, as she sped over Lake Ontario, past the two amazed fishermen, and on into the setting sun.

Missionary to America - By HELEN C. ABELL

WHEN a Canadian, in an American college classroom, hears a cultured English accent straight out of Oxford University, then one is very apt to turn and take a good look at the speaker. This was my first awareness of the Reverend Albert Chinedozi Anonye, the tall, handsome bearded African who soon became the centre of attention during the past summer school session.

Stories about him flew thick and fast. "He is a prince in his own country of Nigeria in West Africa"; "He is a cousin of Mahatma Gandhi"; "He has three wives in Africa and is looking for another one here to take back with him" (this tale emanated from a bevy of hopeful maidens who, no doubt, were indulging in a little wishful thinking); "He was taken into the home of a European missionary as a child and was trained to become a minister." Everyone picked up the brush and added another tint to the colourful background of this vivid personality.

Albert Anonye could have been mistaken for an exhibitionist if one looked only on the surface. His striking personal appearance, or the variety of African and American clothing that he wore. One day a flowing white robe and large turban; another day a snow-white European business suit; a shapeless striped blue and white toga-like garment hanging from his broad shoulders; or a plain, severely cut black suit complete with starched white clerical collar. One never knew in what garb he would next appear.

One day two black-robed Roman Catholic sisters stopped to talk with him on the campus. This interview ended with Albert taking a photograph of the two ladies and they in turn taking a photograph of him. Afterwards with his deep chuckle Albert asserted that if he had been able to prolong this meeting he would have converted both of the Sisters!

This was one of his most likeable qualities, a sense of humour that offended no one and that constantly came into play. At one time a class of which we were both members travelled some fifty miles to attend a "Potato Growers Field Day." Albert wore his flowing white gown and turban. It certainly was a Field Day, but not for the potato growers! Albert stole the show. All during the day people came up to him to be introduced and to take photographs. Newspaper reporters swarmed in his direction. Our departure for home was delayed half an hour because Albert was making a radio broadcast from the grounds. He mounted a new tractor and drove it, to the delight of everyone. He sat on the passenger's seat of a huge two-bladed helicopter that was on display as a machine for "dusting" potato fields. However, Albert refused to take a flight on this machine as requested. He explained very solemnly, with a twinkle in his eye, that his robe would fill with air and he would be carried off solo into the sky.

During classroom sessions it was possible to catch glimpses of the deeper, more serious nature of this man, and to hear from him the story of his background and his reasons for visiting North America.

Albert is one of a family of six children. His father, a farmer in Nigeria, returned from the fields one evening to find that his wife, alone and unattended, had given birth to this boy. For this reason the African name "Chinedozi", "God prepares", was given him. "Anonye" is a family name.

Until this trip to the United States, Albert's entire education was received in Nigeria, West Africa, where he learned to speak five different native dialects as well as Hebrew and English. His teachers had learned to speak "Oxford English." Albert's accent is a faithful reproduction of this manner of enunciation and phraseology.

As a young man he worked as a clerk for the huge United West Africa Company Limited, a branch of Uni-Lever of London, England, which operates an immense farming project in West Africa. All this time his way of life had been oriented toward Christian living. He was always deeply concerned with Church work, especially Sunday School activities with young people. As he describes it, he was "hands, feet, heart and everything in Church work."

Feeling as he did, this man left his clerical job to devote his life to the service of God, the source of his inspiration. For the past twelve years he has preached in Africa, spreading Christianity among his own people. In time he became a District Superintendent of the African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church after pastoring in the Cameroons, Nigeria, the Gold Coast, French Toga Land and Liberia. During this time he started to take correspondence courses from an American theological college to acquire the academic training helpful to a minister in any land.

While he was in the midst of these courses the recent war stopped his studies temporarily. Nigeria, being a British Colony, was in the sterling area, and it was not permissible for him to send money to the United States in the dollar area, to continue payment of his tuition fees.

At the conclusion of the war he left his wife Evelyn and their small daughter in Nigeria, and flew halfway around the world to enroll in Livingstone College in the United States as a full - time student. There were two purposes for his coming to America. One was to complete his

One More Day

By EFFIE BUTLER

ONE more day with numerous calls to duty
Brings daily tasks we dare not leave undone.
Small kitchen chores that show so little beauty
And toil that fills our hearts till set of sun.

One more day devoted unto others,
Few moments to indulge one's own desires,
One has to cook to quell persistent hungers,
There's dusting, sweeping, building up of fires.

But each day brings its rich gift of gladness
That can be found in even trivial things;
One more chance to answer with impleteness
The call to service that each morning brings.

academic training, the other was to share his deep religious convictions and experiences with both black and white people on this continent.

Albert Anonye has received hospitality from people of many creeds and colours during his short time here. He has been received as an honoured visitor and respected as a sincere and inspired servant of God. He has also been the intended victime of racial prejudice, a condition unknown in Nigeria but well known in some parts of the world.

The phrase "intended victim" is used deliberately. The first time Albert, alone, boarded a bus in a certain part of the United States, the driver, noting with amazement that this black-skinned man took a seat in the front section of the bus, preemptorily ordered him to move to the back of the bus, which was the place for "coloured people."

Albert Anonye rose to his full stature. In his deep, clear voice he informed the driver and passengers that he had recently flown half-way around the world, visiting many different countries, in all of which a man was judged for his worth as a human being and not by the colour of his skin. He told them that racial discrimination did not exist in his frame of mind or living, and that the time had come when the world must become one or disintegrate. The startled bus driver apologized. Albert resumed his seat. The local papers subsequently carried the story and picture of this unique man who both preached and practised universal brotherhood with no recognition of nor surrender to racial discrimination.

This and other experiences have caused Albert Anonye to wonder at a civilization that has sent white-skinned missionaries for many years to Africa where these people tell of God, the father of all men. Yet these missionaries come from a continent where men pray to two different gods. The white men pray to their own personal white god in their churches. The black men in their churches do not feel any relationship with this god. They pray to a black god in whose image they were created. There is no kinship between the two. Racial prejudice has brought this distorted view into existence. Albert Anonye is being constantly requested to preach in churches throughout this country. He addresses both black and white people, and to all he brings his message of living Christianity, the practice, not just lip-service, of the reality of universal brotherhood.

Rev. Albert Chinedozi Anonye, With a Group of Students

The other colored student is Mr. L. Kumor of Bombay, India

Listening to this man address a congregation, one is first conscious of his superb showmanship. His black skin and beard contrast with the snow-white robe. His gestures are highly dramatic. His voice rises and falls, at one moment filling the auditorium with noise and shouting, the next almost a whisper. It is impossible to be in the audience and not be moved by this man. Through him Christianity is a way of life, not a creed alone. He is completely filled by his religious convictions. This is one reason for his power. He is completely sincere in his religion. He earnestly desires to know God and to pass on this knowledge to others. His sermons never deal with racial discrimination and prejudice. His texts are from the Bible and bring to his listeners understanding and courage in facing life. As he talks he ceases to be a bizarre figure from a foreign land. He becomes a man of God, bringing light and guidance to other men. The sincerity and depth of the man are best revealed during his sermons.

Albert Anonye is now in the United States. He plans to visit Canada before returning to his home and people in West Africa. Anyone who is privileged to know this man echoes the feeling of an American minister who recently assured his congregation that Africa should reciprocate the missionary work and send more of her deeply inspired religious men to this continent with their message of Christian living expressed in daily life.

In truth the Reverend Albert Chinedozi Anonye is a missionary to America.

The Bridge of Books

BOOKS act as bridges, connecting two or more different worlds, and the youth who learns to love them will find his life greatly enriched, if only he seeks the right kind of reading. It is not given to many of us to see foreign lands, but we may take up a book, and in a few minutes we may tread with Nansen's men the ice, roadless yet fascinating, of the arctic. Or we may visit the greatest mountain chains which the world possesses, and the Rockies, the Himalayas and the Andes may stand before us in all their majesty. We may stand before the pyramids in Egypt, and wonder at the vistas of the millenniums which have gone. Or we may discover the beauties of language in the poet's enthralling words, or live again in history the life of the ages which are now long past. There are few more valuable possessions for anyone than a love of reading. It links us to worlds which we could not otherwise know. Better than wealth to any child is a true love of books. And the greatest of all is the Book of Books, which we call our Bible. Use it, treasure it, enjoy it.

Great Hymn Writers - By ALBERT E. BAILEY

John Newton (1725-1807)

"Glorious Things of Thee Are Spoken." Also seven others.

Newton, the Man

NEWTON started life as a bad boy. His pious mother died when he was seven; his father, a Mediterranean sea captain, soon married again and sent the boy to a boarding school. The schoolmaster ruled with a big stick, and made John hate school. John left for good at ten, went to sea with his father at eleven, fell in love at fourteen, was forced to enlist on a man-of-war at eighteen, but, through his father's influence or a bribe, was raised to a midshipman. John hated the whole thing, deserted, was caught, put in irons, whipped publicly, and degraded to a common sailor. His ship was glad to get rid of him, so he became a sailor on a slave ship bound for Africa.

Once there, he quit the ship and took service with a white-slave dealer on an island off Sierra Leone. Now he was virtually a slave, half-starved, and unmercifully abused by the slaver's black wife. John wrote his father, who persuaded a sea-captain friend to take him off. Now he joined a trading ship collecting gold, ivory, dyer's wood, and beeswax. On a long cruise, a storm nearly finished him; the ship barely escaped foundering; provisions spoiled or were washed overboard; for four weeks they had nothing to eat but fish caught on the Grand Banks. As a result of this fright and reading Thomas à Kempis' Imitation of Christ, John was converted.

John now became a slave trader. It was dangerous business, including treachery of crews and rebellion of slaves. But he tried to make his religion work. Twice every Sunday he held a religious service for his crew. Once a conspiracy nearly took his ship. He finally gave up the slave business and married an English girl.

Now he got a job as tide surveyor at Liverpool, but, inspired by Whitefield, he began to study for the ministry. Many times in ten years he was examined for Holy Orders in the Anglican Church, but was rejected. At last, under pressure from Lord Dartmouth (for whom Dartmouth College was named), he was ordained and sent as a curate to Lord Dartmouth's little village of Olney. There he stayed fifteen years.

There his real life began. He devoted himself to elevating the religious life of the common people. Most effective in drawing young and old was the oft-told story of his shady life; but what endeared him to his people was his interest in them, his own genuine goodness, his earnest preaching of the gospel. In these respects he was unusual.

Newton became what is called an Evangelical. He tried to convert sinners and train them to become saints. In this he succeeded. His congregation grew until he had to build a gallery in his church. Then, besides the morning and evening services, he held devotional evening meetings. On Thursday afternoons he taught little children the Bible and religion.

He began to write hymns, and finally, with the cooperation of the poet, William Cowper, he wrote and published the Olney Hymns—a collection of simple Christian poems, really a book of instruction in the Evangelical faith. In time the use of this book spread over the English-speaking world.

Newton afterwards was a London pastor for twenty-eight years. At eighty-two, he said: "My memory is nearly gone, but I remember two things: that I am a great sinner and that Christ is a great Saviour."

The Hymn

"Glorious Things" is probably Newton's best. Like most Evangelical hymns, it is based on Scripture (e.g., Psalm 87 and Isaiah 33: 20, 21), and is full of phrases that were once Jewish but now are Christian.

Zion: The poetic Jewish name for Jerusalem, the seat of the Temple. After the city was destrayed by Titus, A.D. 70 Christians sublimated the word into the ideal city of the future, miraculously created on earth by God for Christ and his redeemed (Revelation 21: 2, 3).

Rock of Ages: The city's foundation, which is Christ (Matthew 7: 24, 25). Possibly Newton borrowed the phrase from Toplady's famous hymn published three years before. That title for Christ has been continuously used ever since.

See, the streams: The imagery is taken from Moses' striking the rock in the wilderness (Exodus 17: 1-6; Revelation 22: 1). Without water, men would die. So in the Christian life, unless God ("Eternal Love") supplied miraculously this water ("Grace")—God's free gift of saving power and inspiration, citizens of Zion would perish.

All these picturesque details show that ultimate state of the redeemed when God shall have perfected human society—a perpetual ideal that has never yet been realized. Jesus called it the kingdom of God.

Olney Cottage Prayer Meeting, Led by Newton and Cowper

D. P's. I Have Met

By R. W. ARMSTRONG

ONE of the most interesting of the displaced persons I have met is a woman who was born in Eastern Poland. She is married to a man who has had a unique military experience and who occupied some very important positions with the Allied armies during the World War. She and her husband are now in this country starting life anew. They refer to Canada as their "adopted country" and are seeking to establish themselves in positions where they can each give expression to their talents and contributions of their experience to the upbuilding of Canadian life and culture.

This woman was born of Catholic parents and grew up as a devoted member of the church and a practising adherent to the faith. After receiving a liberal education she decided to devote herself to the study of Art. She spent five years in Italy and one year in Constantinople, at which places she received instruction in both painting and sculpture. I am not an art critic, and therefore am unable to place a value upon her work. I know it has something distinctive about it. Since coming to Canada she has made several small paintings, and numerous ornamental articles, which would grace any drawing-room. She models all sorts of figures out of clay, plastic and soap. Artistic lampshades, plaques and tapestries are to be found among her handiwork. She hopes to find a market for these things in Canada and perhaps go into production on a fairly large scale. This is a compromise with her earlier ideals, because she had studied Art for Art's sake and had always thought of it as apart from mundane processes. After a brief mental struggle she decided to capitalize on her accomplishments and convert them into a source of livelihood—for a time at least.

She speaks Polish, German, French, Spanish, Italian and Turkish, but her use of English is, as yet, quite limited. For this reason it is very difficult to carry on the philosophical discussions in which she wishes to engage. In religion she is now a Buddhist, and she says if she only had a good interpreter she could persuade me to change my religion. However, with the aid of a dictionary we are able to make one another understand a good deal, and give expression to a variety of ideas. Her husband, who is a combined Catholic and Spiritualist, listens to our arguments with a mingled expression of amusement and pride.

"Too much think—no good," she said, shaking her head.

The Author and a Number of New Canadians

"Don't you believe the Lord expects us to use our brains?" I asked.

"Yah, use your brain, but not too much. God is very quiet, very sure, and very wise. When we know him we can be quiet too."

As the argument proceeded it became clear that she did not consider it wrong to think, but she was trying to tell me that too much intellectual speculation would put one out of touch with God.

When I compared one of her statements with the teachings of Christianity she said, "Yah, God is in every religion and in every church."

Her husband winked at me and said, "Only Catholics go to Paradise."

"Ah!" she said, "I no want to go Paradise; no fun there. I want to go on in this world; very good place. Maybe I born Swedish woman next time."

Mischief gleamed in her husband's eye as he said, "You might be born a man."

Ah, man no good," she exclaimed.

"It would be an awful thing if you were born a pig," I ventured.

"Pig? Pig?" She consulted her dictionary. "Ah, swinie! Swinie O.K. No sorrow, no grief. Better dan your hot place, but man, no."

After this piece of levity she continued seriously, "Good character everything. Only thing pass on. Mr. Gandhi, good man. I like him much. I go his class. He teach me much. All India have better life because of him. Some of him in many, many humans. Yah, good character best thing, better dan up and down in church." (Here she made a motion to signify standing and kneeling.) It seems she embraced Buddhism during her stay in India.

During the conversation we were in constant danger of being side-tracked by her husband who was anxious to know what I thought about "Spiritism." "Two million spiritists in Britain. Must be something in it. One man said on radio he heard man dead two thousand years talk in Sanskrit. Maybe all this psychic too, but it could be real just same."

After this diversion the woman resumed, "I brought up Catholic, I study Spiritism. Buddhism best for me. Buddhism big. Can be Christian and Buddhist too. Maybe Spiritist. Anything true go in Buddhism. Truth make character. Character best."

"Did you ever read the Bible?" I asked.

"Yes," she replied. "I read the Talmud and the Koran."

"Did you ever read the Gospel?" I asked.

"Gospel? What is dat?" Again she consulted her dictionary. "Ah! I know. Not read much."

She has the type of mind that would revel in the Gospel of St. John, and I am going to see that she gets a copy of it in Polish.

We sometimes complain that we never had the chances that others have had, when the trouble really has been that we didn't have the wit to see them when they did come.

The BUSINESS of LIVING

A Question and Answer Department for Your Personal Problem

PERCY R. HAYWARD: Director of Young People's Work, International Council R.E.
GRACE SLOAN OVERTON: Young People's Leader and Director of R.E.

The Very Young Parsonage-Lady

QUESTION: I am very young although I have been married two years. Our first baby is here. I love our baby. But now all at once I don't enjoy being married any more. I feel sorry for my husband. He is a young minister and tries so hard to make me happy. Everything about being a minister's wife is something I don't like. How my house is kept is nobody's business but mine; yet my husband says we must think of what the church people think. I don't like everybody picking up my baby when we go to church and blowing their breath into her face. My husband says we must not offend the good ladies. I don't like everybody giving me advice. I really want to make a go of our marriage. But how can I when I am so mixed up and when there are so many things about my life that I don't like?

Answer: This is a really good statement of a problem—by a very young wife who really has the best of intentions. But she has quite an assortment of adjustments on hand, hasn't she?

So much depends on how this young matron of the manse handles all this, that we can afford not to hurry as we discuss it with her. And I would say to her first that she should not be at all frightened by the way she feels.

Let me speak to you directly now. Many mothers find themselves in some such mood after their first baby has come. You had previously your romantic love for your husband—and that while still in your teens, remember. Now has come your baby with all her demands for adjustment to a third person in your intimate living. Combining mother love for the first child with romantic love for the husband is quite a tax even for a woman much more experienced than you have had opportunity to become in handling emotional adjustments.

Not being frightened, now look at the other adjustments demanded of you—some not expected of other young wives and mothers. Living in a parsonage is an art that many women cultivate through many decades and still admit to close friends they learn something new every now and then. People in a church and its community naturally expect certain things of their minister's wife. Perhaps they expect more than they should. Certainly not many congregations would unanimously admit they had a perfect wife in their pastor's life. And probably many ministers and their families strive too hard to meet some of their people's expectations. Any way you look at it, being a minister's wife is not an easy life for anyone who has devotion and sensitivity to others and their needs.

In your case, the women in your congregation never forget that you are both the wife of their minister and also a very young woman! So they expect and advise—both. No wonder you feel "mixed up." I venture that women who have never had even one baby advise you about child care. But never let that disturb you in the least—they doubtless mean their advice well. Are you sufficiently mature to hear them advise, to keep good humoured, not to show resentment when they mean well? Keep your own individuality without offending.

Remember how deeply you love this minister of yours—never let that fine, strong, tender feeling go! He is perhaps as much distressed as are you about the way you are feeling. Actually his whole professional future is tied up in your skill in handling this thing you're facing right now. This is a crisis for him—and so for all your own future and for that of your child too. A man who is harassed by his home conditions or by his wife's unhappiness can never be the evenly emotioned, spiritual leader every good minister aspires to be.

As to your housekeeping. Accent the "keeping"—that is, the routine hour-by-hour keeping things in order. Need space or some simple gadgets? You have ingenuity! One improvement in household techniques is worth more to you now than hours of moping!

Is it that the "good ladies" take over the parsonage daughter? Or is it that you go out of your home feeling edgewise toward them in advance? Be honest now.

Your husband tries to make you happy. Say that over and over—repeat that in your prayers. It's really true, you tell me. Then you'd just better be happy! Don't keep him baffled, anxious. Be right there beside him full sail ahead. Give yourself time—be patient with yourself! Watch your sleep hours—practise relaxation. Catch that emotional weariness early. Is there a fine, mature person in whom you can confide—get sustaining help? Hold on—until the day you're a happy lady of the manse with abiding comfort in your husband and family.—G. S. O.

Should We Tell Him?

Question: Some of us differ as to whether an older relative should have been told that he has only a short time to live. What is the wise thing in a case like that?

Answer: It depends upon the inner stuff of the patient.

If he is a nervous, worrisome, easily frightened person whose fear will make himself and others miserable, better let the doctors throw him of the track of the real facts.

If he has the steady courage and wise understanding of two friends of mine now waiting for cancer to do its work, better let him know. Each of these is accepting the fact with a calm courage that is a profound spiritual experience for themselves and loved ones. New insights come through sharing this knowledge. To deny either person the thrill of rising to this challenge would be unfair to his real self.

One hundred and fifty pastors and church leaders representing the Kwantung Synod of the Church of Christ in China met recently in Hong Kong for their annual retreat. Though the Communist advance through their territory was imminent, the mood of the delegates was calm. "We Christians are expecting to continue the work of the Church," declared a spokesman.

On the Wrong Track

THERE is a story of a railway conductor who, in collecting tickets from the passengers one day, told them all that they were on the wrong train. One of them finally suggested to him that he had got on the wrong train himself. And that proved to be the case.

It is a mistake that is often made —to suppose that other people are going wrong, when actually it is oneself that is at fault.

To criticize others over-hastily, or even to blame them unfairly for suspected misdoings, comes all too readily to most of us. Critics of one's fellows find sometimes to their own surprise that they are themselves to blame for mistakes charged against others or for acts or opinions equally wrong. They themselves, and not the others, are on the wrong train.

The Christian Warfare

By ARCHER WALLACE

THERE are men — sometimes religious leaders—who cannot resist the temptation to flatter those in authority. Campbell Morgan in writing of such said: "Many a prophet has been spoiled by going out to dinner." John the Baptist was not in that class, and neither was the apostle Paul. John Wesley was on one occasion asked to preach to a number of magistrates whose sense of justice was never very true. Wesley preached with much courage and reminded them that they were not only judges of their fellow men, but answerable to God for their own conduct. Some of the magistrates were incensed, and very nearly did Wesley personal violence, but he feared God rather than men.

The finest wood in the world comes, not from tropical lands, but from countries like Norway, where long, black winter reigns for eight months of the year. The stout, strong-fibred Norway pine is in demand everywhere. The strongest characters are not those who have been pampered and made much of, but rather those who, like Paul, have seen much of "bonds and afflictions." A great deal can be said for the ministry of hardship. The finest periods of Christian history have always been those times when there was bitter persecution. Times of comparative ease lull into complacency and indifference.

The desire to be popular is understandable, and often commendable, but popularity must not be secured at the expense of Christian principles. It was a kind but courageous leader who declared: "I love the hatred of evil men."

Self-Made Optimists

WHAT makes an optimist? Is it a carefree life, a life into which no suffering enters and no hardships come? Surely not. The cheerful man is often just as burdened with troubles as his pessimistic neighbour, but the troubles do not gain control over him. He remembers the pleasant things, the things which tend to support his faith in human nature and in God. He recalls the kind words which have greeted him along life's pathway, the good deeds which have enriched his life immeasurably, the friends who have cheerfully borne part of his burdens without thought of recompense, the sunny days which every season brought, the glimpses of heaven which he has had along every step of the way. A man cannot well become a pessimist if he continually cherishes the memory of the kindness which he has known every day of his life. He may forget the disagreeable, mean things, but he remembers always the brighter side of life. He walks on the sunny side of the street in his thoughts, and this makes him a confirmed optimist. Isn't this something like walking in the light as God is in the light?

Keeping Lent

"LET me keep Lent,
Let me not kneel and pray,
Forego some trifle every day,
Fast and take Sacrament—
And then
Lend tongue to slander, hold an ancient grudge, deny
The very Lord whom I would glorify.
Let me keep Lent,
Let me keep Lent,
Let my heart grow in grace,
Let thy light shine till my illumined face
Will be a testament
Read by all men,
That Hate is buried, Self, crucified—new born
That spirit that shall rise on Easter morn.
Let me keep Lent."

England's Great Mansions Pass Away

By DONALD SHIER

CENTURIES-OLD Castle Ashby, near Northampton, joins other great English mansions, such as those of the Earl of Derby and the Duke of Sutherland, in being opened to the public—for a price. Lord Derby recently announced that nearly fifty thousand people paid a total of £5,500 (about $17,000) to view rambling Knowsley Hall in Lancashire last summer. The four-hundred-year-old showplace, the Earl says, is now a "going concern."

Perhaps few incidents more graphically portray the change in the British order of things than this dependence of some of the mighty mansions of England—once the castles of feudal lords who owned all they surveyed—upon the half-crowns of sightseers. The Marquess of Northampton, owner of Ashby, quite frankly admits that he can no longer afford the upkeep of the vast house in any other way. Many owners of other once-great landed estates have been forced to sell or close their mansions.

"Since William rose and Harold fell, runs an old ditty, which indicates how permanent and unalterable the great feudal successions were once considered. Until our own day, indeed, the Duke of Norfolk, Britain's premier peer, might be seen at times near Arundel, driving in his state coach with powdered footmen, even as his forefathers had done for centuries.
There have been earls at Arundel."

With their armies of workers, their villages and woods and quarries and farms, some of these landed estates retain many of the features of self-contained principalities. But for generations now they have been disappearing, one by one—a process of change greatly accelerated by the two great wars and their aftermaths.

"We shall all be poor together," Britons philosophically said during the last war. Even then they knew that the monetary cost of victory could not help but impoverish the nation. But the poor man had the consolation of knowing that, perhaps for the first time in history, the wealthy bore their full share of the burden. And the erstwhile rich, their fortunes shattered by staggering taxation, regard comparative poverty as a reasonable price for freedom.

Surtaxes, succession duties and other levies make it practically impossible, economists tell us, for the "richest" Briton to have an income of more than a few thousand pounds a year, for his own use.

Thus, to maintain a great country house in the style of former generations costs far more than lord or prominent commoner can obtain now, from either his land or other earnings. At Chatsworth the Duke and Duchess of Devonshire, for instance, used to think nothing of housing four hundred and seventy week-end guests under one roof—at a cost of several thousand pounds. The services of hundreds of men and women were required to staff such a mansion.

There just isn't that kind of money left in the Old Land nowadays—to say nothing of the difficulty in obtaining the help. So war and its aftermath have been levelling the social scale. When the "millionaire" and milord could get no more rationed foods or clothing coupons than the working-man, a new brotherhood of sacrifice began to unite the country in the mighty effort: first, to win the war, and now, to win the peace.

Centuries Old Castle Ashby is Now Open to the Public

Human nature is gregariously inclined, and as each of the country manors closes, its neighbours are left a little lonelier. Thus the process is accelerated. Most folk have to be born to "country life" really to enjoy it. In former times the lord or squire of the manor centred his life there. To manage the estate was his career—and usually, to his credit, he did it well. But the city family of recent times who had the money to buy a country estate regarded it rather as a hobby, and seldom made it pay financially, even before economic changes made that feat more difficult.

What is to become of the great houses and manors of yesteryear? Some of the more splendid, or those of historical interest, have, or will be, preserved as national monuments or as public institutions. Among those, according to recent reports, is to be Cliveden, seat of Lord and Lady Astor. The famous couple have expressed the wish that Cliveden be used, after their death, by the National Trust, to further international understanding, especially between Great Britain, the United States and the Dominions.

The manor of Ashby dates back to the time of William the Conqueror, and was acquired from the Earl of Kent in 1512 by an ancestor of the present Marquess of Northampton. The castle, begun in 1574, is itself an historic dwelling which might well be considered as a national memorial in the future. Queen Elizabeth was among its distinguished guests, as was James I. In the household records it is stated that in 1616 the castle employed eighty-three household servants, three musicians, four chaplains, and "the Gardener of Ashby"—doubtless with scores of assistants.

Interior views, showing magnificent chimney pieces and other decorations representing the labour of many artisans, indicate the kind of splendour that was characteristic of the homes of the great in former generations. The passing of such great houses, as the new order displaces the old, may cost England something of the romance and colour of long ago. But no doubt most of the throngs of folk who visit Ashby Castle will reflect that lovely as they were, these great mansions represented a concentration of wealth and power in the hands of a few, which could not be reconciled to modern ideas of democracy and social justice.

The Growing Tree and a Piece of Paper

By ALBERT N. HOLMES

IN a garden across the street from my study is a beautiful and sturdy maple tree. Some mornings I see it limned against a quiet sky in symmetrical poise: at other times I see it shaken by the tempest, its branches waving violently in struggle, its sinuous and supple trunk bending, swaying and recovering its balance like a young athlete in physical combat. On one such occasion my attention was drawn from the tree to a piece of paper blown about the street. Vagrant gusts of wind would catch up this bit of paper and whirl it through the air and deposit it in my garden; but in an instant it would be caught up by another gust and blown back into the street. Back and forth, hither and thither it was carried by the capricious wind, while at the same time my sturdy young maple, though shaken by the tempest, gathered strength and grew.

Nature can do nothing more for a piece of paper than blow it about, saturate it with rains and make it brittle with the sun and heat until it decays and is blown away like dust. But with a tree whose roots are deep in the earth and whose branches reach up into the sunlight, Nature can fashion a thing of beauty and usefulness. Rain and sun, wind and calm, all help to build the tree in strength and beauty.

We, too, must be deep-rooted in some central, dominating interest or purpose round which our lives become integrated. If we permit ourselves to be swayed by every capricious and vagrant thought and emotion, we shall become like "chaff which the wind driveth away." Forces that make for growth and development may be all about us but cannot work through us. They cannot build us up; they can only break us down.

A man who thought of prayer only as asking God for things once came upon a man praying.

"What are you asking God for now?" he asked cynically.

"I am not asking him for anything just now," was the unexpected reply. "I am just trying to 'clutch in' with God's purpose. His power will do the rest."

An ambling engine uses gas and will wear out in time, but it accomplishes nothing in the way of useful service. It must be clutched in to gears that transmit its power to a drive shaft, saw or mandrel. Lives that do not accept a purpose and task in life are like ambling and racing engines that use up energy to no useful end. A useful, happy life is one that discovers and yields to God's will and purpose. Through him flow the powers that make for growth and development and real achievement.

White Silence

By W. H. FRASER

DEEPEST calm in any world
Is a field of snow;
There we saw it . . . dreams unfurled,
Scenes of long ago.

Friendly home and winter night,
Moonlight, shadow charm. . . .
Nature spreading robes of white
Over town and farm.

Breeze to sing, and cloud set sail
For that stage below;
With a star to guard the pale
Silence of deep snow.

NATURE, SCIENCE AND INVENTION

The Covered Bridge

COVERED bridges may be outmoded in many places, pushed aside when roads were straightened and widened. But they are by no means a forsaken method of building. They are very practical in areas where there is an ample supply of cheap timber, as in New Brunswick and Quebec.

New Brunswick, in fact, builds two or three covered bridges each year, and had in 1948 some twelve miles of covered bridging. It claims to have more covered bridges than any other place in the world. Certain it is that the Hartland Bridge over the St. John River is the longest. Its nearest rival, in Switzerland, is some four hundred feet short of Hartland's twelve hundred and eighty-two feet.

On the contrary, Nova Scotia's covered bridges have been reduced to three in number, and Ontario has only one left.

The wooden bridge is cheap in comparison with steel bridging. It is also economical in upkeep, for planking may be replaced more easily than steel girders. Both types suffer much the same during flood conditions, depending upon their substructures.

The sides and roof of the covered bridge are not merely rustic or ornamental. They serve the very practical purpose of protecting the timbers from weathering and decay. Compared with replacing a truss, a little repair work on roof or side-sheeting is nothing.

The wooden "house" also strengthens the structure, and keeps the overhead bracing from leaning. "For protecting costly framework against decay, thus assuring greater durability, and to stiffen it against the gales," is how the old-timers phrased it in the Minutes of their Council meetings.

The Hartland Bridge, Over the St. John

For that reason, too, they limited the speed of the traffic. "Walk your horses" was over the portal arch on one New Brunswick bridge, and probably many more. A farmer could be fined for trotting his team over a covered bridge.

In earlier times, the interior of the shed was posted with notices of auction sales, coming circuses, religious meetings, or of a Box Social to be held in the schoolhouse. These signs were sure of being read. Youngsters on their way home from school played in the bridges. Farmers meeting there with their wagons paused to chat, or wait for the rain to blow over. Young people drove slowly through its dimness—or halted.

In fact, these came to be known as "kissing bridges", and many a young swain in the horse-and-buggy days took advantage of the cool darkness. Hardier characters did, too, and darkness in more than one covered bridge was a cloak for robbery and even murder.

That brought about the shutters or lattice effect sometimes seen, and eventually lights. Sometimes these are electrically powered. More often, a couple of lanterns are hung at either end of the bridge. A young lad or old man is usually hired for this office.

But the highway patrolman is responsible for seeing that the bridge is "snowed." Far from having to shovel snow off the covered bridge, it is necessary to carry snow in to cover the floor, so that farm sleighs will not be stranded half-way across.

"Fido" Helps Air Travel

AIR travel, statistics show, is as safe as other ways of getting from one place to another; but is it dependable? Not always, passengers say, until planes are able to take off and land on schedule in spite of adverse weather. At the great Los Angeles airport, for instance, handling one million two hundred thousand passengers a year, traffic is often shut down entirely by ocean fog. To cure this, Los Angeles is installing an all-weather landing system to ensure arrivals and departures on schedule. Heart of the new landing system is a FIDO ("fog intensive, dispersal of") installation that burns away the fog and makes the runway an island of good visibility, even in "zero-zero" conditions. FIDO was a British wartime invention and has been considerably improved since then.

Triumph of First Jet Airliner

BRITAIN'S De Havilland Comet, the world's first jet airliner (Canada was a close second), in its operational tests achieved height and speed never before reached by a passenger plane. At Hatfield, it reached a speed of four hundred miles per hour at a height close to seven miles (thirty-six thousand nine hundred and sixty feet) with weights strapped to the seats to simulate a full complement of passengers. Officials said the test shortly would go a stage further and have the ship at a height of forty thousand feet, doing close to five hundred miles per hour. Experts believe that if the Comet's development flying continues as smoothly as it has begun, she may be in service on British Overseas Airways Commonwealth routes in 1951.

Nature School

IN the heart of Montreal's famed Botanical Gardens is one of Canada's most unusual classrooms. It has ninety pupils, the oldest being seven years old, the youngest four. And already they know more about Canadian nature than most adults. For one hour a week these young Montrealers study such subjects as the care of turtles; the songs of the robin, the sparrow and the oriole; identification of poison ivy; and the barks and leaves of Canadian trees. Marcelle Gauvreau, well-known botanist, calls her class "The School of Awakening." She believes the children will be better citizens in future because of their knowledge of the outdoors.

Birds That Build Houses

MR. A. J. MARSHALL, an Australian zoologist appointed to London University, has secured permission to take a dozen blue-black satin bower birds from New South Wales to join the eight already in London Zoo. The birds are so-called because they build bowers or houses. They make a floor of sticks or twigs and then set up two "walls" of sticks bent over to meet at the top but leaving a runway between. The bower birds decorate these "houses" with brightly - coloured objects. Some specialize in blue things—flowers, bits of blue cloth or the housewife's blueing bag. Others like yellow or green.

College Life in the University of Miami, Florida

College Life in Florida

ONE of the fastest-growing universities in the United States is in the midst of a gigantic building programme which involves the moving of the entire campus to another site. This is the University of Miami, whose pre-war enrolment of about twelve hundred students has grown to nine thousand. One of the youngest of the major colleges of the South, Miami was established as a university only in 1926, and until recently functioned in one of those highly ornamented, coloured stucco hotel buildings which multiplied like mushrooms during the Florida boom period. When depression came to Miami, the hotel owners were glad to dispose of the huge, triangular hotel, built around a landscape patio and topped with an observation dome, to the young and growing college. These quarters proved inadequate, however, with the great influx of students following the recent war, and the University of Miami purchased a new, spacious property in suburban Coral Gables. Modern architecture with the latest developments in scientific lighting and ventilation is being employed in the new buildings, the entrance to one of which is here shown. Who would not like to be an undergraduate at Miami, with such beautiful surroundings?

The University of Miami has many faculties but has won special recognition in music and marine zoology. The college's symphony orchestra and symphonic band are well known in the Southland. Zoology students have the wonderworld of tropical waters practically at their front door. For a number of years weekly trips to the seashore, to study marine life from diving hoods, have been featured in this course. The university, so close to Caribbean lands, also stresses the importance of Pan-American relations. The Latin American division offers special courses in the history, geography, political culture and commercial development of the lands to the south of the United States. The world position of the American republics and business training for those engaged in Pan-American trade are studied. Each winter a Pan-American forum is conducted for several weeks to acquaint the student body in general, and visitors, with Pan-American affairs. Student exchanges between Miami and South and Central American colleges are arranged, while educators from Latin-American lands supplement the resident faculty in offering courses on these subjects. No doubt the Latin Americans feel quite at home at Miami, where climate and architecture is not greatly different from that of home.

NEAR and FAR

News and views from everywhere.

In 1947 the United States spent $6,507,000,000 on medical care, insurance and supplies—and $9,640,000,000, on alcoholic drinks. Another $3,880,000,000 went up in tobacco smoke.

The inscription on the Thomas Jefferson memorial is for ever timely. It reads: "I have sworn upon the Altar of God hostility against every form of tyranny over the mind of man."

Recently the Czechoslovak Bible Society held its first meeting. The society has taken over the work in Czechoslovakia which was done for many decades in that country by a branch of the British and Foreign Bible Society.

The latest merchant ships built at the famed Scottish shipyards have a separate cabin for each seaman, with hot and cold water, desk, armchair and bedside lamp: a far cry, indeed, from life "before the mast" in former times.

The Evangelical Church of Czech Brethren has set up a committee for foreign missions. So far the church has only one field worker, in French Equatorial Africa, but theological and medical students now being trained will probably go to Indonesia.

The United States claims the world's largest rosebush—at Tombstone. A white Banksia, about fifty years old, the giant has grown from one trunk, now over forty inches in diameter, to a height of eight feet, and an estimated one hundred and fifty thousand blooms cover it in May.

David Livingstone's pocket notes, the basis of his "Last Journal", a set of six autograph field maps and other precious manuscripts concerning modern history's most celebrated missionary have been found in an Edinburgh attic. The Australian Broadcasting Control Board has ruled that all commercial stations must give at least one hour each Sunday to a religious programme, including when practicable a church service; that all denominations be given fair treatment in allocating time; and that no charge be made for broadcasts included in the hour reserved for religion on Sunday.

When the Roll is Called Up Yonder

he's got scales on his eyes. Now, Lord, I want you to take them scales off. Do it anyway you want to, Lord. Reason with him if it's reason he's got to have. I'm not smart enough. I can't argue with him no more, God, because he's a college man now, Lord, and I'm still just the way I'll always be. So reason with him, if you've got to do it that way. But if that isn't going to be enough, why, then I guess you'll just have to do as you did with the blind man way back yonder. You'll just have to spit on him, Lord. But make the scales to fall off his eyes, Lord! Please, Lord. You got to! Amen."

All that week John came down to the creek bank and there, with nothing to come between him and his God, he prayed the same thing. The last night he suddenly felt light and happy and confident. He didn't know exactly why, but he said, "I believe I've got the victory. I believe you're going to do it! Thank you, Lord. Thank you."

Bud came home from the lake the day they took the binder out of the shed and all though the next two weeks he and John worked side by side in the fields. Sometimes the thing John wanted to know burned like a fever within him and he felt like stopping the horses and getting down off the load to talk about it in the shadow of a stook. But he didn't. That wasn't the way. He said, "I'll not mention a thing. I'll leave it up to him. When it's time, he'll tell me."

Then one day the harvest was over and Bud was standing on the back porch with a little half-filled grip dangling from his brown hand. His mother's eyes were red again and this time it wasn't for joy. Bud was going to join the ship. John, in the background, leaned heavily on the pump and the same thing was burning at his heart again. The Cape was a rough place. A man could easily slip off a rock, or go over in a gale, or—O God! he couldn't stand it like this. He had to say something.

Then he thought of that last night at the camp meeting and the sweet assurance that had been his, the knowledge that everything was going to be all right. Hadn't he left everything to Someone higher than he? Yes. . . . It was all up to the Lord now. Not him. So when it came time to say good-bye he just said, "Good luck, son. Drop us a line when you can. We'll always be proud of you."

Autumn went out with an angry gust of rain and sleet rattling the dead leaves and once again gnarled grey limbs poked bleakly into gnarled grey sky. The snows came and in the warm stable the cattle and sheep clanked lazily at their chains now or grunted with fullness. In the kitchen John and his family denned themselves up for the long, cold evenings, and while the storms roared in the pipe and the oven reeked of drying spruce, they ate russets and amused themselves. Sinless card games of Lotto or Old Maid. Sister at the organ. John telling stories with a silent child on each knee. Finally the evening Scripture and the simple prayer before the cold trek up the dark stairs to bed.

After a while, spring. And before they knew it, summer had come and it was camp-meeting time again.

He didn't see the big car at the pasture gate until the dog began to bark. He looked up and his jaw dropped. It was the long yellow roadster and behind it was the "Gipsy Queen", the fabulous house trailer with the four wheels. "It's Van," he said half aloud. "Probably on the way to the lake again. Parked here for the night, or maybe he's dropped in to argue with me again." He went up. The trailer was open. But it wasn't Van who said "Come in!"

It was Bud.

And it was Bud who did the talking. John couldn't. "We pulled in so late last night we decided not to wake you up, Dad. You see, Lucille and I were married the day I hit port and this is our honeymoon. I guess maybe it would have been more polite to tell you these things, but we wanted to surprise you."

"That was my idea, Dad." It was Lucille who spoke. John blushed. A beautiful girl like that, a rich man's daughter, a college student, calling him Dad!

John's congratulations were as wholehearted as they were awkward and after that ordeal was accomplished he said, "And Van lent you this ship for the big event? What a boat! Look at that mahogany!"

"Lucille bought it, Dad. It's ours. We thought it would be just the thing to take to camp meeting."

"Camp meeting?"

"It's just about time again, isn't it?"

"Camp meeting, son? You're going to camp meeting?" John wondered if he could keep his eyes dry. "What made you decide that way, son?"

"Remember me saying I had to have a scientific religion or none at all? Well, seemed to me that Van had all the arguments that day—that his was the scientific way to look at things. But it couldn't have been, because it didn't work out. Van and his wife got a divorce last month. What's more, Van got into trouble playing the horses on the firm's money. That's why Lucille bought the car and the trailer. Van had to have money. . . . And anyhow, Dad, I decided a lot of things when I was down there away from the rest of the world, and I decided I wanted your kind of home when I got married. Lucille's been thinking that way, too, I guess. That's why we're here."

Lucille came over and stood behind her husband and put her hand on his shoulder. John said, "Awful glad you figured it out that way, son. Awful glad." Then he felt a choke coming up his windpipe and he wished to goodness he had a clean handkerchief in his pocket. He couldn't stay here. He was too full up. He didn't want to make a fool of himself in front of a college woman especially. He stood up.

"Got to get the cattle," he said. "I'll be back in a few minutes and then we'll go to the house together. They'll be plain crazy when they find out you're here."

He went outside and picked up his willow gad.

The sun was climbing through the low limbs of the eastern trees and in the bright places of the lacy shadows, the gossamer hung heavy with dew. It was a wonderful morning to sing, and when he was a little distance from the trailer, he let it out till it rang away out across the pasture and the echoes came floating up from the swamp beyond, mixed in with the tinkling bits of a thrasher's notes.

On that bright and cloudless morning
When the dead in Christ shall rise
And the glory of his resurrection share,
When the saved of earth shall gather
To their home beyond the skies:
When the roll is called up yonder,
I'll be there.

And the cattle in the mist of the far alders, heard, and began lowing in answer as they turned to meet him.

Think This Over

NOT all slogans work or are workable. This, I think, is: "Not who's right, but what's right!" That may be used in a thousand relationships.

College Boys as Big Brothers

Lafayette College, at Easton, Pa., has developed something that students in colleges might properly follow. Here is the news note:

"An experiment with juvenile delinquents initiated by a group of Lafayette College students has developed into a club for underprivileged boys sponsored by the Easton Junior Chamber of Commerce in Easton, Pensylvania.

"Last spring, twelve Lafayette students, all members of the Zeta Psi fraternity, took under their wings twelve boys who had been in trouble with the law and were classified among the 'hardest' of juvenile delinquents.

"Probation officials saw little hope for the boys, who had roamed the streets, stayed away from school, and committed many petty larcenies.

"The college of students became 'big brothers' to the boys. They invited them as guests to the fraternity house several days each week, played games with them, and talked with them. College officials state that the delinquents 'became better boys and none of the dozen has been in trouble with the law since.'"

A Recipe from Kingsley

"If you want to be miserable, think much about yourself—about what you like; about what you want; what respect people ought to pay to you, and what people think about you."

An Australian Comment

In a Primer in Dietetics there is this sentence: "From a purely physiological standpoint, there is no defence for alcohol; it is a poison and any pleasure derived from it is short-lived and paid for heavily." One also would do well to remember the scripture: "At last it biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder."

Augustine says

AROUND THE WORLD WITH A CAMERA

ROUGHLY speaking, Patagonia comprises all of the mainland of South America, with Tierra del Fuego and satellite islands, lying south of Bahia Blanca. That Argentinian city in turn lies some four hundred miles south of Buenos Aires. From the capital, the traveller may take a regular passenger plane, and within twenty-nine hours—which includes a ten-hour night stop-over—step out at Rio Grande in Tierra del Fuego, the austral counterpart of Canada's northern barren lands. Here the passenger reaches a point thirteen hundred miles farther south than can be reached by regular plane schedule anywhere else in the world, the latitude corresponding to Indian Harbour in Labrador.

Like the islands south of Magellan Strait, most of mainland Patagonia is a bleak, semi-arid and uninviting land. Towards the Chilean border, formed by the main divide of the Andes, wooded hills rise higher and higher, and here is some majestic mountain country which is being developed as an important playground and vacationland. Between the Atlantic and the foothills, however, is a series of huge plateaus, deeply eroded, and rising in a succession of escarpments each about three hundred feet higher than the last. A few rivers, ice-born in the Andes, thread their way eastward. But the windswept, inhospitable land receives a low average rainfall, and is both colder and less fertile than the pleasant pampas to the north. The vegetation on the Patagonian tableland becomes sparser as one nears the Atlantic, where the bleak winds are most severe. Trees are few, and even the grass is sparse, too much so for cattle ranching such as makes prosperous the northern and central provinces of the Argentine. Here in the south only the hardy, less fastidious sheep can thrive and prosper. At the Atlantic shoreline, in one of the loneliest spots in all Patagonia, this mounted shepherd—great distances on the sheep ranches make walking out of the question—watches his newly-shorn flock.

In spite of its inaccessibility, the Andean region of Patagonia was explored at an early date, owing largely to the fabulous story of a city set among mountains of gold, told to one of Cabot's captains by an Indian chief. Centuries of fruitless search, and constant battles with the Indians, followed. Most of Argentine Patagonia lies remote and almost isolated from railways, roads and other means of transport. Minerals and oil give promise of potential wealth, and greater development may come, as in Northern Canada, through air transport.

Dear Mr. Grant:

That was very kind indeed of you to send me the articles from the "Times" about South Africa. I read it all last night and learned quite a lot. A queer way the "Times" has of conveying much by juxtaposition, by omission, and by the wry mention.

The people who run the South African Institute of Race Relations are in this country now -- Mr. Quintin Whyte and his wife. We hope to see them later this month in Atlanta. I have read also the New Statesman's recent cautions that explosions are a-coming.

I don't know what thing it is deep down in Anglo-Celto-Teutono people that makes so few of them able to treat everybody else as equal. The answer to it all is in recognizing merit and talent wherever it appears and rewarding it with friendship and dignity.

Please write us again.

Dear Dr. Mitchell:

I am most appreciative of your note of September 11th.

Mrs. M. E. Tilly told me that you were out of the city while I was in Atlanta, which I regret.

Please don't fail to let me know a little in advance of your next visit to New York, and indicate, if you will, what would be a convenient time for a visit.

Dear Mr. Ross:

Many thanks for your instructive conversation the other day.

I have talked with Mr. Rufus Clement, President of Atlanta University, about the possibility of holding in Atlanta a meeting late this coming winter on African matters. Mr. Clement was enthusiastic and offered the services of Atlanta University for meeting rooms and for housing a limited number of delegates, etc. He thought it of great importance to hold such a meeting in a representative Southern city.

If the proposal seems practicable, I do hope you will be early in touch with Mr. Clement in order that dates can be worked out.

For a variety of reasons, some of which you and I discussed the other day, it seems desirable to draw together and strengthen the interest in the South in African matters. I should like to add my own and my Council's warm hope that it will be feasible to center such a meeting in Atlanta.

Dear Mr. Mitchell:

Thank you for your letter of June 28th. The reports Professor Fawcett referred to are part of a continuing series that the foundation I am associated with--The Institute of Current World Affairs--has been distributing to a limited group of Americans interested in African matters. I began the series in East Africa, there is one from South Africa, and there were nine from West Africa. Some of them have been published in revised form in the Geographical Review and the British publication West Africa.

If you write to Mr. Walter S. Rogers, Director, Institute of Current World Affairs, 522 Fifth Avenue, New York 18, he will probably send you copies.

May I close with a word of encouragement for your own work. Next time you are in Chicago I would very much like to hear about it from you. We may have also some areas of mutual interest in African affairs.

Yours sincerely,

Dear Mr Mitchell,

As requested I enclose a copy of my little article stressing the need for the study in this country of Africa and its relations with the world. Indications from Morocco, the Protectorates in the Union, Egypt and the Sudan, Nigeria and elsewhere emphasise the need for a good look at the Dark Continent.

I am grateful to you for helping me get a glimpse of the South, I only regret that I did not see the old plantation and coastal belts. Hope all goes well with you and your work, keep an eye open for news from Africa, as long as Alex Campbell is "Time" correspondent there'll be something in that magazine.

Yours very sincerely,

Graham Young

Africa

Will the West lose Africa ?

At a time when events in the Far East are occupying much of the thought and energies of the United States, when this country is bearing the brunt of the Korean war, and has taken the lead in restoring Japan as a counter-balance to the power of China to speak of Africa is to be a voice crying in the wilderness. Events in the Middle and Near East which focus attention nearer home are also naturally more important than Africa itself as they might expose the throat of that undefended Continent to attack.

Nevertheless Africa has to be watched. It is not likely that the successful efforts of Indonesians, Burmans, Iranians, Indians and Chinese to drive Western nations out of their privileged positions has passed unnoticed in Africa. If there is one factor common to the peoples of this continent it is the growth of nationalism even though they may not know the meaning of the word. Fundamentally it is part of a world wide urge for independence and racial self-respect and the enjoyment of the material benefits of Western civilisation. Over most of Africa this resolves itself into a struggle against European Powers who in the days of colonial expansion obtained control of various parts of the Continent , but in three areas the problem is complicated by the presence of minority racial groups who not only have made these countries their homes but have been largely responsible for what they are to-day. Kenya, the Rhodesias, and the Union of South Africa are inhabited by white men who have introduced law and order, a modern economy, health services, and the civilising influences of church and school. The same kind of development has taken place in French, British Belgian and Portuguese colonies but these territories are controlled more closely from the home country and the white officials, traders, missionaries and business mendo not for the most part intend to give up their homeland permanently.

Another minority group, the Indians have built up a trading community in the three territories of the British Commonwealth mentioned above and are to be found in most of the small towns and villages of Natal and the Transvaal in the Union. Now that Africa has been awakened by the impact of the forces of Western civilisation it is no longer content to remain politically weak , economically inferior and socially outcast. While the coming struggle in the colonial territories may end comparatively peacefully with the return to their own lands of the white administrators, traders and businessmen, this solution is impracticable for the farmers ansd settlers of the independent or semi-independent countries. To the African this is not an important factor, to the white man in these countries it is the over-riding consideration. Many Americans remembering their own history and guided by humanitarian instincts and a belief in the sanctity of numbers would be inclined to applaud the struggle for freedom of African peoples, but the recent history of the East has shown that inexperienced Nationalist governments occupying areas which are strategically or economically valuable are extremely vulnerable to external aggression or internal disorder. If the white man in some way or other lost control of Africa there would be a danger that the Western world would lose ,at least temporarily, raw materials which are desperately needed, justnas they have lost rice, rubber, tin and oil in the East. There also valuable strategic points have been jeopardised- Korea, Suez, Burma- from which a potential enemy could more easily attack. While Africa south of the Sahara is not as important strategically as these other areas, its harbours, roads, ports, food, raw materials, and labour would be invaluable for defence in depth, counter-attack and supply. If the worst were to happen and the resources of the Far East were to be denied to the West because of political changes, conquest or the needs of India, Japan, Australia and others a serious situation might arise. Africa can and does produce oils, metals such as cobalt, chrome and manganese, wool, cotton(in the Sudan) hides and skins and many other commodities. She could certainly produce more. Her harbours supply food, water coal and repair facilities and these services could also be expanded.

The question might be asked whether there has been any change since World War IIwhich would make Africa less valuable to the Western world than it was then. To answer this question it is necessary to draw attention to some changes which though reported in the world press have not perhaps been evaluated from the point of view of their possible effects.

I. The accession to power in 1948 of the Nationalist Government under Dr Malan in the Union of South Africa

2. The granting of practical self-government to the people of the Gold Coast.

3. The banishment of Seretse Khama from the Bechuanaland Protectorate.

4. The publication of a report by responsible officials of tentative proposals for a Central British African Dominion i.e.autonomous.

When General Smuts was defeated in the elections of 1948 and when later the brilliant Liberal Cabinet Minister Mr J.H.Hofmeyr as well as DR. VAN DER BYL the non-party creator of the South African Iron and Steel Corporation and the Electricity Supply Commission died within a short period of each other it was clear that an era had ended. Although Smuts in his home politics was conditioned by public opinion and was never the emancipated figure of Versailles and San Francisco it seemed near the end that he was moving towards a greater recognition of African demands for political representation. Hofmeyr who was to have succeeded him would have gone further. With the advent of a new government there was put into law as soon as possible a policy which though rooted in the past was the fruit of years of thought and planning on the part of those who had so long been in opposition. This policy called"Apartheid" or " separateness" by its supporters and " segregation " by its opponents has been embodied in legislation designed to leave as few loopholes as possible. The Group Areas Act provides that the different racial groups European, Native, Coloured and Asiatic will live and work in separate areas of the cities. In a sense the other legislation is complementary to it. Marriage between white and non-white is now prohibited by law where formerly only the sanction of custom kept it to a minimum. Identity cards which indicate the race of the holder are to be issued to everyone in the country. The last non-white voters on the common roll -the Coloureds-(people of mixed race, Malays etc) have been removed and given compensatory forms of representation. Native artisans such as builders and carpenters are now forbidden to work in white areas but may be trained to work among their own people.

So far the effects of this legislation are not particularly noticeable in South Africa which has always had a pattern of segregation. The results in the rest of Africa were profound. The legislation together with the speeches of Cabinet Ministers on the necessity for " baasskap" -overlordship or mastership- of the white man served notice on Africa that in the South the white man was there to stay, and that if the black man was to advance progressively towards independence and a higher standard of living it was to be in his own areas where he did not compete with the whites.

No matter what the sacrifice or the economic distortion involved - for of the native population of about 7 million roughly a third live in the towns and a third work on white farms - this policy it was proclaimed would be carried out.

2. While these developments were going on in the South an exactly opposite process has been speeded up in the British colonies reaching furthest on the Gold Coast. Here for the first time in Africa a Colonial Power has handed over the substance of governing power to an assembly of Africans, some elected and some representing chiefs. The results are not yet visible and there are still reserved powers in the hands of the Governor but the news has spread through Africa like wildfire . The colonies of Britain, France Portugal and Belgium will never be quite the same again an example has been set.

3. At the time of the setting up of the Union of South Africa provision was made for the eventual absorbtion in the new country of the three territories located on its North Eastern & North Wetern borders and in its centre . These territories are ruled nominally by chiefs under the old tribal system, but they are linked to Britain by treaties and are in fact administered like colonies. From the start the Union Government has tried to persuade the British Government to transfer control to it, only to be met by the seemingly unanswerable reply that this transfer is dependent on the wishes of the inhabitahts who have ot be consulted and that there is no sign of willingness on the part of the people concerned. For many years these territories languished economically owing to their poverty of resources but since the war large sums of money have been voted and a good deal spent on soil-conservat--ion, afforestation, schools, roads, home crafts, co-operatives and similar schemes. In Bechuanaland Tshekedi Khama acting as Regent of the leading tribe did much to bring his country along, and naturally aroused considered opposition from the more conservative members of the tribe and the affiliated tribes. Seretse Khama the chief designate was educated in England and while overseas married an English girl. After some opposition from the tribesman which was overcome he brought her out to rule with him. The British Government promptly deposed him and banned him from the territory which is now being administered by officials of the British government. These dramat ic happenings had strong effects. The whites of South,Central and East Africa FELT that this was a good example of what happens to race purity and the supremacy of the white man when Africans are given equal rights and opportunities before they are ready for them. Many Africans on the other hand felt that the British Government had fallen into line with Dr Malan and the white settlers of Rhodesia. The end of the story is not yet in sight but it is not unlikely that the renewed demands by the Union for the incorporation of the Territories are spurred by the fear that Britain is not to be trusted adequately to maintain white supremacy in Swaziland, Basutoland and Bechuanaland.

4. The Seretse incident probably ha stened a move in Central Africa coming chiefly from white settlers in the two Rhodesias for Dominion status i.e.independence of Downing Street. Officials have now prepared a draft report which is being considered by interested parties for a scheme by which Nort hern Rhodesia (white men own and work in the mines and a number of farms) Southern Rhodesia(about 120,000 whites carrying on mining, tobacco-growing general farming and light industry) and Nyasaland (few white settlers, missionaries, officials) amalgamate to form a Central British African Dominion self-governing with the rights of Africans to representation guaranteed. If the plan is ever adopted and works a link with Kenya would probably be established and a viable state able to stand up to pressure of opposite kinds from Great Britain and the Union would come into being. Such a state would be very glad to include at least a portion of Bechuanaland Protectorate.

Apart from these political events the most striking thing about post-war Africa id the development taking place in the economic sphere. From the vast new goldfields of the Orange Free State and the steel town of VanderByl Park to the copper mines of Northern Rhodesia and the Belgian Congo, from the factories of Port Elizabeth and other Union towns to the hydro-electric scheme at the source of the Nilefrom coal mines, asbestos quarries uranium deposits, forestry and ranching comes an impetus which is changing the face and the character of Africa.

Add to this the new railway developmen t, the extension of airways, the improvements to roads, the immigration of settlers, and the progress of medicine and it is evident that the Dark Continent so long asleep in its jungles is slowly and painfully awakening. How much of this is known in the United States and how far does it affect American interests. There are not many placems in the world to-day where a struggle is not taking place for the minds and bodies of men. Possibly Africa is destined to be a "third force" linked to Europe through the Colonial Powers but if it is not it must align itself either with the Unites States or World Communism. It is and will be for a long time too weak to take an independent stand like India. At present there is little evidence to suggest that Communsin had made a great appeal to the minds of Africans nor has it been able to exploit nationalist movements for its own purposes. Sensible and far-seeing men however will realise that in Africa the Soviets have an opening which could be of priceless value to them in dividing the democracies, hampering the supply of war materials, and helpin g them to pose as the champions of the common people- 2" a peoples' democracy ! " Africa south of the Sahara is ruled by the British, Belgian, French, Portuguese, Rhodesianand South African governments, Liberia, the Gold Coast adn Abyssinia and perhaps in the near future Nigeria are self-governing native states. There is not and cannot be uniformity in the way these peoples are governed but where rights and freedoms are concerned what is done in one affects the others. Boundaries are drawn with no regard to natural resources or the wishes of the inhabitants. There are hundreds of tribes and languages in Africa who have little or nothing in common but they may be welded to-gether in opposition to what they consider a common enemy. It would be more than a tragedy if the white man was ever considered to be that common enemy. Who tO-day knows what is going on in Africa or has the knowledge to correlate happenings in various parts of the Continent. ? That there is a connection is evident from certain straws in the wi e.g white farmers in Kenya have been in touch with Dr Malan's government, Southern Rhodesia and the Union were at one over the Seretse incident, Kwame Nkrumah Prime Minister of the Gold Coast has warned the Union Government that his country is vitally interested in the fate of the Africans in the Union, a native football team from Johannesburg playing in Elisabethville was accused of putting the local people in touch with certain racketeers in Capetown, a woman in South Africa renounced her white citizenship in order to marry a coloured man, white settlers in Kenya have proposed that any extension of political powers there should be confined to the aboriginal inhabitants i.e. excluding the Indians, India has made it clear that she is interested in the Indians of South And East Africa.

Has the time not come for a independent body with adequate resources and first class staff or a university similarly equipped to start a school of research into the inter-related problems of Africa and the world. ? A great deal of work has of course already been done on a score of separate subjects, and Lord Hailey's great African Survey has covered most aspects of Africa. But continuous work under one direction is needed if Africa is to become known especially in the United States. America in the past and to-day has done a great deal to help. The Phelps-Stokes Foundation provided South Africa with a great report on " The Poor White Problem" and other Foundations such as the Carnegie Corporation have given great assistance to Scholarship. There are schools in London and Institutes there and in the other " mother countries" for specialised studies. When decisions are to be made in the future by these powers they will be guided by thier own officials and the knowledge sma ssed by these scholarly bodies. If the U.S.Government is called in at any time to advise help or adjudicate it will be necessary not only for its officers to be well-informed, the American people will also have to be told what it is all about. Recent history in the Near, Far and Middle East has indicated that revolutionary events usually come as a shock to the public which is consequently ill-prepared and forced to support hasty emergency decisions which are sometimes too late. Africa is not lost to the Communists because they have not started on it, but it is not permanently won for the West. Ignorance has too long been taken for bliss, it is no substitute for real knowledge as the basis for policy.

Dear Mr. Unaka:

Very nice to talk with you the other day.

The enclosed issue of our small magazine has an article by Emmett Murphy, who went to the Institute last summer at Northwestern.

And an earlier issue for March, 1950, has a list of colleges in the South which in '49 had African students.

I send you several copies of each of these. Do pass one of each on to our Gold Coast friend whom I sat by on Sunday.

Let me know if either of you comes to Atlanta.

Dear Emmett:

Very many thanks indeed for that fine, long letter.

I have sent a couple of paragraphs from it on to Channing Tobias, who will be much interested.

My brother Broadus the other day in New York told me of a Johns Hopkins Ph. D. candidate who consulted his adviser early in the game as to his writing a thesis on "Man's Relationship to God," and ended by doing a careful study of the local slaughter house. This is a gentle prediction that you will narrow the subject of the students some way. But subject to narrowing, it seems like a useful idea.

As to politics here, people had been deeply impressed with Stevenson before this Nixon business broke. I should think Eisenhower's only escape is to throw over Nixon and have the Republican Convention meet again and select another vice-presidential candidate. The drama of that might draw public opinion back to Eisenhower. But I think Stevenson is ahead by a good distance.

Send us the news. We are hungry for it.

Fort Hare University College, C.P.
4 September, 1952

Dear Dr. Mitchell:

I can't remember whether I've written you or not. I held out writing you for a long time waiting til I could report something definite of my research plans, and they've just crystallized in the last week or two. Since I have to consider my degree in anthropology I have done a soul searching job of trying to choose between a study of one of the nearby native communities and a study of the students here at college. The latter finally worked out, though I may have a hard time justifying it to my faculty at Chicago as a suitable subject for social anthrop. Quenten Whyte first suggested it to me as something that needed doing very badly, and the possibilities in it intrigue me. Furthermore, I find that I have a great sympathy and liking for the students, which makes the study much more pleasant.

The great bulk of the students are Bantus and still speak their native language, though there are a handful of Indians and Coloureds here. The Bantu students, though largely Europeanized, still share many old cultural elements and were for the most part raised under tribal society. They are very politically conscious and spend a lot of time griping about and discussing the plight of their people. That sort of thing is officially discouraged by the college authorities, hence it goes on on the QT. The staff members are not very liberal by American standards and impress me as being so wrapped up in their personal position in life that they regard protest from the students (or any natives) as being dangerous and irrational. Thus there is evident ill feeling between staff and students except for a few individual exceptions, and this ill feeling is also along race lines. The students are, as nearly as I can tell, slightly inferior in scholarship to American students, and are rigid and non-spontaneous in their study habits and thinking. The inferiority could be easily explained by the inferior system of education they have grown up under and by their feeling that the very critical and often hostile eyes of Europeans discourages initiative in studies; 'give the lecturer back just what he gave you and you'll be all right', 'do nothing except what you're told to do or you'll be adversly criticized', etc.

Anyway, the situation deserves serious study, particularly since these students will be the future leaders of the African peoples in this end of the continent. Most students seem to belong to the Youth League of the African National Congress, though this is forbidden by the college, and they want rights which the Europeans say they aren't prepared to give. Although the Europeans in this area seem to me to be almost identical with the more conservative Southerners, I think there are many important differences between the students and American Negro students. I am anxious to make a thorough study of the backgrounds of as many of the students as possible to see where and how their characteristics came, and to describe the students as completely as possible.

The great numbers of native Africans seem to frighten the Europeans here very badly. Most Europeans we have gotten to know impress me as being ernest, friendly, unimaginative people who are desperately striving for security. The hostility and restlessness of non-Europeans threatens that strong wish for security, and the reaction is to bear down harder and retreat into their intellectual shells even further. A case in point and illustration: We have a 15 year old garden boy one day a week day a week. He goes to school nights and is just learning English. He works also a day for our next door neighbors. The man next door is head of the theology department at the college. The boy works from 8:30 to 5:00, pay is 21¢ a day plus lunch and tea; he uses his money to keep himself in school. For his lunch one day I gave him bread with butter, and the lady next door (a very friendly and kind-hearted woman) observed the butter with evident alarm. She cautioned me almost immediately against giving him butter with bread: 'they never eat butter; they don't like it; it's bad for them since they don't eat it at home; (and finally) it costs too much so we never give it to them.' (It costs 42¢ a lb.) Her alarm mounted as she gave these arguments, but her embarrassment at her reasons finally caused her to break off the lecture and hurry home. The next day she approached me to bring up the subject again and went through the range of arguments again. She and her husband have included in their hospitality to us many cautions about not spoiling native servants, not trusting them, not paying them more than the accepted rate (from $2.50 to $5.50 per month plus food), keeping them busy with odd tasks, etc. I can only interpret such urgent concern over the natives as being a fear that something will disturb the already shaking status quo, thus threatening the security and feeling of status and power that control over inferiors gives one. The cases are so frequent I could fill a book already just setting down the volunteered advice on how to handle natives.

This fear has inevitably stimulated more trouble. The African National Congress, harrassed by the government and all Europeans except Communists, is working overtime to organize and stimulate the masses of peasant African natives. The hostility toward it and the desperate measures used against it has made some of its work sub rosa and underground, and its strength seems to grow in direct proportion to the attacks against it and the measures to hold the natives in check. The Defiance of Unjust Laws campaign which it directs is growing and is attracting the cooperation of illiterate peoples all over the Union as well as of all literate peoples among the Africans. The more frightened the Europeans become the harsher and less compromising they become, but they seem to actually stimulate antagonism. The whole situation here makes me glad I'm an American who is here for just a year.

This whole business affects the students very strongly. The whole student body is sympathetic to the Defiance campaign and similar efforts, while the staff is almost as unanimously opposed to it, and this just increases the misunderstanding and undercover hostility between the two groups. Since my wife and I are Americans (who are very popular among the African students; they often come to our house just to hear us tell about life in the States) and visitors we get the gossip from both sides straight from the horses mouthes. I'm sure I'll be able to get a great deal of valuable information from the students.

What do you think of the idea of the study? I wish I could set forth all the many small items of information I have picked up since we have been here, because not only would they be interesting per se but would help to show how central these students are in the whole political and social milieu. I couldn't say 'know the students and you know the future of the Union' but I do think they will play an important part in development over the next 20 or 30 years.

Other than my usual excitement over learning new things about race relations and politics here, life is pretty quiet in Alice. It is a sleepy little country town that has a certain distinction because Fort Hare and Lovedale Missionary Institution are both here with their educated staff members. There is a movie (bioscope) twice a week in the town hall showing mostly older Hollywood films; everybody in town tries to get to every show. The town is rather pretty, being nestled in a valley with mountains on two sides and hills on the other two, but the surrounding countryside is very dry and sparse looking. Cactuses flourish, and large numbers of cattle somehow manage to keep going on the brown grass growing all arpund. Native kraals dot the hills in everydirection, making one wonder how they live in such sterile country; the answer is that they barely do. All towns in South Africa close up at dark and on Sundays; therefore night life is either non-existent or completely privately arranged except for the movies on Wednesday and Saturday nights. Living expenses are much less than at home, though salaries are too. Mechanical gadgets, cars, clothing, shoes, and luxury items cost more than they do in the States; indeed, a new Ford costs around $2700. Beef is fairly plentiful at present, and though tougher than American beef, forms our main eating pleasure since it costs so little: top cut steaks and fillet less than 30¢ a lb. A drought has made most green vegetables somewhat expensive, but citrus fruits and guavas and pineapples are very cheap.

Vacations are no problem to the folks here since there are two cities within 150 miles (Port Elizabeth & East London), mountains and mountain resorts 20 miles away, and the coast and beach resorts about 70 miles away. If we can possibly get up the money while we're here we're going to take a tour to S. Rhodesia that will scribe a circle around the Union and show us at least some of the more interesting places. We have a two month vacation in December & January that would be a good time for the trip, or at least half of it would. The other half I want to spend out in one of the native villages near here getting my fingers into a 'primitive' group to see what it's like.

I've been interested in checking people's reaction to my New South article since we've been here. The students like it, but several who should be in the know have told me I have underestimated the influence of Communism in the Union. It would, they say, have little appeal to the Africans except that it preaches their liberation and Communists are the only white skinned people who accept and work for the aims of the native peoples. I suppose the most obvious difference between race relations here and in the U.S. is the virtually total lack of concrete help from whites. The S.A. Institute of Race Relations seems to be fairly well regarded by the students, but they feel that as a research organization its help is limited, and its policies are not as bold and egalitarian as they would wish.

Hope you'll find time to write me and tell me any news you might have. American political news looks good to us, what little we hear of it, since Stevenson is doing better than we had ~~xxxxx~~ thought he could. If you hear of anybody who is anxious to help students from here come to the U.S. to school we could surely oblige them. I think nine tenths of the student body would like to visit and study in the States.

Very sincerely,

Emmet Murphy

Dear Dr. Mitchell:

I took to heart your suggestion that my research topic must be narrowed in scope, and I have been working all along to do just that. Several weeks ago I air mailed a thesis suggestion to my advisors at Chicago to ask for their criticisms and advice; the document I sent them was fairly detailed and well worked out, but it will of course have to be revised several times more. In the meanwhile my research has been going nicely, though it is slowing down now due to exams next week. I won't be able to collect any more information from students til next term, which begins late in February, but during much of the vacation period I will be busily engaged in studying and analysiing what I've collected the past three months. Then, when the students come back off vacation, I can start in again with more specificity.

I have been concentrating my efforts on getting detailed and extensive information from the students on their racial and political attitudes and ideologies. Those two things are their first loves and dominate their lives, as nearly as I can tell. The study looks so far like an effort to describe completely the ideological 'culture' of these students, and to analyze and explain it in terms of 1) family & general social background; 2) racial and ideological forces in the students educational backgrounds; and 3) the same sorts of forces affecting them in the present relations between European and Non-European. Since these students form an very important segment of the African 'intelligentsia' which is mixed up intimately in the advance of the Non-Europeans and the nationalistic movement, the study should have a great deal of practical as well as ~~xxxxxx~~ academic implications.

Life here is pretty tense at present. There is so much hard feeling and fear on both sides in every realm of life that it begins to appear rather bizarre and unreal. Trouble between staff and students here at the college has been brewing ever since we arrived, and erupted last week in a mass boycott of the college morning prayer services, a lot of name calling on both sides, and a feeling of urgency in both groups. The students finally backed down (since exams are so close), but they still are muttering grievances and threats among themselves (and to me, I'm happy to report). I'm anxious to get this study finished by next June so we can go home in July; it's too much personal strain to stay any longer unless absolutely essential.

Incidentally, I have put out feelers to various college people for a teaching job for me next year. However, I would also be interested in research or action work if you hear of any prospects. I want to write my dissertation and catch up the odds and ends for my degree while I'm working next year; due to financial zero conditions it is mandatory that I have work as soon as we return home.

Sincerely,

Murphy

Dear Dr. Mitchell:

Things are rather quiet for us over here now while the school's summer vacation is on, but the students are due to start arriving soon for the opening on 20 February. My wife and I took a short vacation trip up to Durban for two weeks, enjoying the Union more than at any time since we arrived last July. Durban and most of Natal are semi-tropical, lush, exotic, and full of really beautiful scenery. We were real tourists during our trip, going to the visited places, gawking at things, and buying a few souvenirs. I had saved about $15 for souvenirs, and I spent it at one swoop in the Zulu market in Durban for shield, assegais, walking stick, knobkerry, grass beer strainer, and pottery. Though the Zulus make this stuff strictly for the tourist trade, it still represents essentially the old wood and metal craft of early days, and looks good sitting around in a room. The Indians in Durban, if you ignore the abysmal conditions under which they live (which we, as tourists, tried to do), lend a nice touch of exotic color to the city. They excel there in fruit growing and selling and gold craft; the latter caused my wife to spend the bit she has been saving for souvenirs. We visited with a better-off-than-average Indian family, though they were still poor, and got a warm and very hospitable reception, including a couple of meals of Indian curried dishes which put on each of us several extra pounds. The Indians, warm, friendly, peaceful, quiet, industrious, artistic, and colorful, are really the forgotten minority in S.A. Their small numbers don't give them the dubious comfort that the teeming Africans have, and they are hated by whites and Africans alike.

My study is progressing; the vacation has given me time to look my materials over thoroughly, to plan my work for next school term, and to write a rough draft of the history of race contact in S.A., with emphasis on laws and policies affecting Africans. This latter I think is necessary to give background and perspective to my study.

I've written to Chicago and N.Car. asking the departments to look out for me a job for next year. If you have any suggestions or hear of any prospects I hope you'll remember me and let me know. I'd like very much to get something as soon as possible, to start working on 1 October, 1953. It will be easier for me to write my dissertation the nearer I am to Chicago, but I wouldn't refuse a good offer anywhere as long as it would give me a few hours a day to work on my dissertation. Teaching is my first choice, but any good job would do. I can teach courses in introductory soc. & anth., race relations, African affairs, American culture, and several special topics in both soc. & anthrop. I also give interesting lectures on African politics and race relations, Marxism in Africa, and related topics, materials gathered from my harrowing adventures among the ideological jungles of South Africa.

This latter is more serious than it sounds. I have been fortunate in having contact with several of the top notch people in the African National Congress, and have discussed every inch of their policies with them. They are, as you probably know, strongly inspired by revolutionary Marxist doctrine, and have been amazingly frank with me, considering my bourgeois liberal sentiments. This info does not relate directly to my study, but it does give me a valuable knowledge of what's going on over here. Since I have no call to take part in the Union's problems, and have been specifically warned to keep out of them, I am keeping my lip buttoned until I get back to the U.S. But I'm keeping my eyes and ears wide open nonetheless.

Our best regards to you and Mrs. Mitchell,

Pat Murphy

Dear Mr. Levey:

I came across in some African magazine reference to the new African movie The Boy Kumaseno. Friends here in the British Consulate undertook to track it down for me and ended with word that you had the sole print in these United States.

I was in New York last week and knocked at your door but caught you not there.

I run, as you can see, an interracial organization hereabouts and have an interest in African matters, and so thought it would be nice to see the movie. Can you send me a word about what times and arrangements could be made for renting it?

Dear Dr. Mitchell:

Things are quiet over here for the present, and everything seems to be waiting for the elections next month. There are political speeches, to be sure, by the various candidates, but so far nobody seems to be very excited about the campaigns. The Defiance Campaign is in a lull period, though the trials of many of the leaders of the African National Congress are continuing. One of them whom we know rather intimately, Prof. Matthews son, is appearing right now at the courts in Port Elizabeth. We heard vague rumors for a while that the ANC might attempt to stage a mass strike of some kind to obfuscate the elections, but nothing has happened. Many of the people over here, both black and white, feel that if the present government is returned to power ~~th~~ South Africa will be in for a real fascist regime, with newspaper censorship, opening of mail, prosecution or imprisonment of political dissenters, etc. It is of course true that the recent Public Safety Bills would seem to lend themselves to be used in those ways, but who knows.

My study is progressing very satisfactorily, though the time is getting awfully short. I will have to finish all my business with the students before 1 June, when exams start, and we leave on 9 July for the U.S. As you predicted months ago, I have had to narrow my scope and efforts very considerably. Last term I got some good material on racial stereotypes, political attitudes and aspirations, and general perceptions of the larger social world. This term I am concentrating almost exclusively on life histories from a few students; my wife and I together have 18 students from whom we are taking autobiographies, I have several African staff members writing their life stories with a little guidance from me, and I am sponsoring a general contest among the students for the best unguided autobiography. Actually I am providing a fairly explicit outline for this contest autobiography, but what I get will depend on how much the students write and how many questions about their own development they answer. But it won't take much of my time, and very little of my money ($6.00). The 18 students that we have are giving us from 2 to 6 hours per week for writing and oral interviews, and my analytical eye so far is ensuring good results; from the 18 students we expect to get 10 or 12 really useful life histories. I will attempt, on the basis of them and what I already have, ~~to trace the~~ growing up of the African intellectual in this multiracial society, hoping to show something of what it means to do so in both sociological and psycholigical terms. I will try to answer such questions as What is the African intellectual social type?, From what sorts of backgrounds do they come?, What patterns and forces operate to guide their development?, What are their expectations for their futures?, How do they assess themselves and the social world about them?, How much do they represent a sociological phenomenon integrated into South African society?. These questions I use to guide my research; almost certainly I shall pare them down and focus them more specifically when I begin to analyze my materials. Redfield and Hughes at Chicago have made suggestions leading to the narrowing down I've done so far, and they think I'm on the right track now. I do too, of course.

I have a very feeble chance at a job at Tulane for next year, but I'm not banking on it. Beyond that nothing has so far materialized. Right now I'm worrying about whether I'll get an SSRC fellowship to get us back home and pay off some of the expenses we've incurred over here.

This year in retrospect looks good to us. I think we have learned a great deal about race relations and social and political problems in general, as well as a great deal about South African life in specific. All in all it has so far been fairly pleasant, too, despite the tensions that eddy all around the country and affect everybody who does any thinking.

Dear Dr. Mitchell:

We have been right in the middle of some of the exciting political developments here, particularly the Defiance of Unjust Laws Campaign. The students, as you might imagine, are quite vocal and conscious of that sort of thing and support the campaign unanimously. On Monday night a group of 37 volunteers defied the Pass law here in Alice, as well as the curfew law, by appearing in the streets after 9:00 without passes. They were singing the African national anthem, in Bantu, when arrested. The campaign is of course passive resistance, so no violence occurs. On Tuesday the trial was held and native Africans (at least half of whom were students from the college, demonstrated all day by sitting and standing in front of the court house and softly singing resistance songs. Here are some of the events: trial, scheduled for 9:30, was delayed til 2:00. Two truckloads of police were brought in from surrounding towns just in case of violence. Trial ended at 5:15 with all defiers guilty and receiving from two weeks to four months at hard labor. At 5:30 the police drove the crowd away with a baton charge, injuring three students slightly. The students then all marched back to the college singing 'Nkosi Sikilele i'Afrika', their national anthem.

On Wednesday morning at 6:00 Joseph Matthews, son of the man whom I'm replacing, was arrested and charged on Thursday under the Suppression of Communism act. Now over thirty of the top African and Indian leaders have been arrested under that act. I have read it; it stinks to high heaven. Any person who has at any time furthered the aims of communism in any way, etc. is a communist; any person who organizes any changing of laws by force is also a communist (force is not defined and can presumably mean numbers). The students have been advised by the Cape leader of the African National Congress (just before he went to jail) to lay off demonstrating, since the government would love to close the college. Most of the students, incidentally, are active members of the ANC's Youth League and expect to form the second or third string of leaders as soon as the first string goes to prison. They are determined to keep the Defiance campaign going and to achieve equality within the next few years.

I am studying the students as my year's research. Volunteer informants come over for an hour and a half weekly to give me detailed information on their families, their backgrounds, their religion, their politics, race attitudes, ideals, emotions, et al. Then 25 or 30 students drop in each week for visits and tea, during which time I learn a great deal of random stuff about them. So far I'm surprised at their similarity to American college students. They are shyer, have less self-confidence, and are more politically conscious than American students, but are just as smart. They love America and things American (clothes, movies, cars, jazz, literature, etc.), but are swayed by communist argument & propaganda into a lack of faith in American international relations. They feel capitalism has has had its day, but they are sentimental about American culture and Americans.

If you have questions about anything, particularly current political movements here, don't hesitate to write and ask. Hope I can later do a little report for New South on the Defiance movement.

Very sincerely,

Murphy

A HISTORY OF SOUTH AFRICA, Social and Economic. By C. W. DeKiewiet.
Oxford Press, 1941. PP. XII + 292.
Price, $ _____

In this book, A History of South Africa, Professor DeKiewiet traces with broad interpretative strokes, the social and economic history of South Africa. "In no other British colony of settlement" he says, "were the difficulties of racial contact so bewildering....and of South Africa's racial problems the greatest by far was over 800 miles from Cape Town on the Eastern Frontier. Instead of 30,000 Hottentots, who already spoke the language of their Dutch masters, there was a great native population on the frontier and beyond, which numbered millions. The contact between these and the Europeans is the dominant theme of all South African History."

The first half of this book deals with the coming of the Dutch and the British to South Africa, the expansion of the frontier, the development of the diamond and gold industries, the Boer War, and the formation of the Union of South Africa. Then follow chapters on contemporary problems—gold mining, poor whites and poor blacks, civilized labor, and the regulation of industry. Here there is ample documentation of the "dominant theme." The whites have a passionate faith in their own superiority, a determination to preserve their dominance and their separateness. But segregation is a myth, for here, as elsewhere, there has developed a "close and inseparable relationship" of white and black. South African political and economic policy, then, is the old story of the conflict between the humanitarian ideals of democracy and the desire of the dominant group to protect itself against "the competition of men in a lower social and economic position, and against their encroachment upon spheres of employment and standards of living dedicated to white labour." (P. 276)

DeKiewiet's book is essentially a book of ideas and interpretation. The author's premises are not those of equalitarianism. He says that "Greater opportunity and a higher economic reward for the natives would be at the expense of white income and the white standard of living." And he thinks that "The economic and political governance of South Africa illustrates clearly how a community can be at the same time democratic and authoritarian."

Notes on African matters. 2/5/51

Dr. Leo Hansburg, an anthropologist at Howard University, I am told knows all about Africa.

GSM'S Notes on African matters. 2/3/51

I was told by the man Earl Parker Hanson that one Julien Bryan, who now runs International Films, Inc., in New York City, is sufficiently sensitive a guy to know how to do the African job. Understands people. Office formerly 1600 Broadway. Lately back from Yugoslavia.

Could be Prof. Earl Parker Hanson, 201 South Hanes, Newark, Delaware. Telephone, Newark 6496. Wants to do research toward turning out six volumes on Africa, more or less as follows: Geography, Cultural Anthropology, European Contacts, and three more I forget what.

Another guy, knows languages, Frank Charles Laubach. A sometime missionary. Bugs on languages. Worked in Africa. Listed in Who's Who. c/o Commission on World Literacy and Christian Literature, 156 Fifth Avenue, New York City, or 14 Beacon Street, Boston.

An ancient, Dihdwo Twe, c/o John Ross, 3445 12th St, N.W., Washington. Unlisted phone, Columbia 4105. He is a Kru tribesman. So old that he knew Mark Twain. Now running for President of Liberia and in this country buying campaign buttons and ribbons. First aborigine so to run. Wise old boy.

Hanson's advice: The trouble about American Negroes in Africa is that they get over there and talk racial politics. African countries are just countries, and the fact that they are Negro countries should fade away. Africans in those countries don't want to be treated as Negroes. They want to be treated as citizens of their countries.

Another quote from Hanson: Such and such a person is interested in preserving what appears picturesque to a cultural anthropologist, whereas what an African wants is an automobile and a filling stateion.

GSM'S Notes on African Matters. 2/5/51

I conferred with the man Kendrick Marshall, U.S. Office of Education, Ext. 6300, Branch 2628, Room 3714, Fourth and Independence Avenue, Fourth Street Side.

He in turn put me in touch with Mrs. Savilla Simons, of the State Department. She is sister to one Fryer, who is number one man on the educational part of Point IV. She is daughter to Millis, the labor economist, now deceased.

I met with them and the man Kendrick.

Mr. W. Roy Ulrich
Atlanta Chamber of Commerce
Volunteer Building
Atlanta 3, Georgia

Dear Mr. Ulrich:

Here is some review of the notion about an Atlanta Institute for African Studies.

That's a rapidly developing continent, the last one still in Colonial tutelage. This country draws many raw materials from it, and doubtless in the future will draw more. And as the level of living rises the continent will improve as a market for American products. It is also a continent beginning now to push up through the map that we know, whole new peoples and nations, self-conscious and demanding. The Gold Coast only the other day elected a Native majority to its parliament, and pushed considerably nearer to the Dominion status its politicians are demanding. Nigeria clamors to become a separate nation. And with the complications of South Africa, there will be ticklish problems to solve as the people of Africa move forward.

It is a continent we in this country know little about. Where would you turn for a close understanding of African Geography, or for translations into leading African languages? And what do we know of tribal and cultural history? Yet we are pretty certainly going to have to deal with African matters more and more. Since the British have put their great Near Eastern base in Kenya it is clear that our joint military planning takes in protection and use of a supply route across central Africa. The Congo has the world's richest source of uranium. Our old link with Liberia tightens rapidly; Firestone and U. S. Steel both have considerable investments there. Each of these companies has done a good deal in the way of welfare development. And the various British colonial governments have created a whole series of Development Corporations, well capitalized with public and private funds, bent on providing in presently backward areas hydroelectric power, modern transportation, new processing and finishing industries, organized crop marketing, and other avenues of economic progress. Human and veterinary medicine have made great strides in the last few years, and vast areas hitherto uninhabitable are opening to crops and cattle.

This all adds up to the prospect of a considerable intake, in Africa, of persons trained to do the new technical jobs. They will need the whole range of technical and professional personnel that are at work in this country inconspicuously to attain the level that is sought. Much equipment will be American, and American trained people will be needed to go out with it. In many aspects of public health, sanitation, agriculture, and engineering Americans will be called for. Sometimes by the British, sometimes by quasi-independent African States, sometimes by international authorities.

We have in this country no institution equipped to train these people for their African service. My friends and I inquired last month, by letter, of Columbia University as to what courses they offered on Africa. "One," they said, "on African music." Northwestern University has a famous Department of Anthropology, and people there have a specialized knowledge of parts of Africa. The University of Pennsylvania did some work a few years ago. Two or three other Universities have shown some interest. Lincoln University, at Oxford, Pennsylvania, has lately established an Institute of African Studies, thinly staffed, but eager.

I have no official information from the State Department on this matter, but I have corresponded with and talked with people there, and I feel sure they would welcome the growth at various points in the United States of a body of knowledge about Africa.

It seems to me inevitable that this country will in the next very short while take up the job of learning about Africa. If the South lets things rock along, all this new study will be done in the North or the West. I want some of it for the South. We hereabouts contain as a third of our population a people of African descent. What history has been taught them, and us, about Africa has been wrong; all was not barbarous disorganization (though the slave-trade had brought much demorilization). Africans had made an adjustment to an extremely difficult continent, and were living there in some dignity, with a good deal of governmental organization, and quite a lot of handicraft production and trade. It would bolster Negro pride in the South to learn more of the African past. And it is certain that the African future will have its repercussions in our own bi-racial pattern; repercussions less dangerous if there is full information about what is involved.

Many of the people who will be employed in technical assistance over there should be American Negroes. Where will we find better ambassadors of western democratic ideas? Or people more speedily effective in teaching to Africans the American-type skill?

Proposal, therefore: That Atlanta find the means to establish an Institute of African Studies. It should probably be an independent body, with its own trustees, but it should have a close faculty tie with existing educational institutions in the Atlanta area. It would need a library, and four or five research professorships, in perhaps Geography, History, Anthropology, Languages, and Economics. It would need scholarship money, and it should have a way to send its students to Africa or elsewhere for periods of interneship. Graduate students only. Perhaps twenty or thirty a year. Degrees might be granted by existing institutions.

Such an Institute would in the course of a few years go a long way toward establishing Atlanta, and Georgia, as a center for American interest in the whole growth of the African continent. And with sympathetic interest and understanding would go an enlarged commerce.

The thing would be difficult to do, certainly. The harder because nobody thinks a Southern city could show the character and strength that would be needed. But the truth is we could, and it would be good business, and good public policy.

I do hope you will explore about, and see what reality lies in this whole idea.

Sincerely,

George S. Mitchell

We have in this country no institution equipped to train these people for their African service. My friends and I inquired last month, by letter, of Columbia University as to what courses they offered on Africa. "One," they said, "on African music." Northwestern University has a famous Department of Anthropology, and people there have a specialized knowledge of parts of Africa. The University of Pennsylvania did some work a few years ago. Two or three other Universities have shown some interest. Lincoln University, at Oxford, Pennsylvania, has lately established an Institute of African Studies, thinly staffed, but eager.

I have no official information from the State Department on this matter, but I have corresponded with and talked with people there, and I feel sure they would welcome the growth at various points in the United States of a body of knowledge about Africa.

It seems to me inevitable that this country will in the next very short while take up the job of learning about Africa. If the South lets things rock along, all this new study will be done in the North or the West. I want some of it for the South. We hereabouts contain as a third of our population a people of African descent. What history has been taught them, and us, about Africa has been wrong; all was not barbarous disorganization (though the slave-trade had brought much demoralization). Africans had made an adjustment to an extremely difficult continent, and were living there in some dignity, with a good deal of governmental organization, and quite a lot of handicraft production and trade. It would bolster Negro pride in the South to learn more of the African past. And it is certain that the African future will have its repercussions in our own bi-racial pattern; repercussions less dangerous if there is full information about what is involved.

Many of the people who will be employed in technical assistance over there should be American Negroes. Where will we find better ambassadors of western democratic ideas? Or people more speedily effective in teaching to Africans the American-type skill?

Proposal, therefore: That Atlanta find the means to establish an Institute of African Studies. It should probably be an independent body, with its own trustees, but it should have a close faculty tie with existing educational institutions in the Atlanta area. It would need a library, and four or five research professorships, in perhaps Geography, History, Anthropology, Languages, and Economics. It would need scholarship money, and it should have a way to send its students to Africa or elsewhere for periods of internship. Graduate students only. Perhaps twenty or thirty a year. Degrees might be granted by existing institutions.

Such an Institute would in the course of a few years go a long way toward establishing Atlanta, and Georgia, as a center for American interest in the whole growth of the African continent. And with sympathetic interest and understanding would go an enlarged commerce.

The thing would be difficult to do, certainly. The harder because nobody thinks a Southern city could show the character and strength that would be needed. But the truth is we could, and it would be good business, and good public policy.

I do hope you will explore about, and see what reality lies in this whole idea.

Sincerely,

George S. Mitchell

Dear Mr. Harvey:

At Dean Loemker's request, I take pleasure in sending you a copy of a letter written some weeks ago to the Chamber of Commerce here in Atlanta.

Several of us here are pushing along this line. One of our main purposes would be to afford the South an opportunity to play a part, modest we know, in adding to the sum of knowledge available to the State Department in its expanding responsibilities.

If any of us can assist you in any way, let us know.

Dear Mr. Tobias:

The check from the Phelps-Stokes Fund which you so kindly granted me to attend the Institute on Contemporary Africa reached me several weeks ago. I am very grateful for this aid, and I hope I can do work in my career in anthropology and study of Africa which will justify it.

Dr. Mitchell made the suggestion that I send you full reports of the work of the Institute and my activities, and I am more than happy to follow the suggestion. I shall include in this letter all I can give of first impressions, and at the close of the term I shall write you again probably at more length.

I registered for credit in the Institute on Friday, June 22, and began classes on Monday, June 25. There was some confusion among most of the Institute members I met during registration since we were required to go through the regular academic procedure, yet were in somewhat of a special status. It was not, however, traumatic, and we were able to finish in four to six hours. Each person is expected to register for two courses out of an offering of six Institute courses, and also take the Seminar which is restricted to Institute members. The regular courses meet one hour daily Monday through Friday, while the Seminar meets two hours on Tuesday and Thursday afternoons. I registered for "Cultural Traditions of Africa", and a history course in "Modern Africa". The first is conducted by Kenneth L. Little, PhD., Reader in Anthropology at the University of Edinburgh, the latter by Harry Rudin, PhD., Professor of History at Yale.

Other members of the staff were Dr. Herskovits, Joseph Greenberg (Ass't. Prof. of Anthropology, Columbia U.), Lyndon Harries, M.A., Lecturer in Swahili, School of Oriental and African Studies, London, Vernon McKay, PhD., Dep't of State, Division of Non-Self-Governing Territories, and member of the US delegation to the Trusteeship Commission, United Nations; and Paul Wingert, PhD., Associate Professor of Art, Columbia University. Dr. Herskovits, as Director of the Institute, is in charge of the afternoon Seminar. In these sessions we have a full series of guest lecturers on special interest areas pertinent to Africa. (The first was by a Dr. Brozen, economist at Northwestern, on "Technological Change in Underdeveloped Areas").

Mr. Greenberg is teaching a course on Language Problems of Africa. Mr. Harries, himself a clergyman, teaches "The Role of Missions and Education in Changing African Life". Mr. Rudin, who has written on the history of the Cameroons, teaches "Modern Africa", using an historical approach from the beginning of Eurppean contact. Mr. McKay offers "Political Problems of Africa". Mr. Wingert, reputedly well acquainted with African art forms, gives the course "Art of Negro Africa".

I might pause at this point to offer several criticisms I have so far of the setup of the Institute. The staff seem to be highly competent, and have a great deal to offer, but the organization of the Institute has a somewhat stifling effect upon this reaching the participant (or I should say, student). Since we are required to register for formal academic courses, we are initially restricted to receiving material from only two of the available seven experts. Second, the formal nature of the courses, with rigid academic grading, reading assignments, and term requirements in the form of papers and exams, promises to further restrict the free movement of each student. And third, all of the courses except the Seminar, and even that to some extent, are organized largely on the basis of formal lectures which do not admit of widespread discussion on the part of the class members. Fourth, since undergraduate college students are admitted to the classes along with special students, foreign students, and graduate students, the level of material considered has started on rather lower than I had anticipated. Since I have found myself responsible for three term papers and a lengthy specified amount of selected reading, I have no time to follow up questions in which I am especially interested except as these coincide with the requirements.

The Northwestern Library has a large collection of works on Africa, and these are in part catalogued separate from other volumes. Many of the most pertinent works, however, have been placed on a reserve shelf from which they cannot be removed. Hence, what reading to be done in them must be done when the student can spend time in the Library. Physical arrangements are good. Northwestern has a beutiful and well equipped campus, and most of our facilities are among the best. Dr. Herskovits has arranged for a special dining room in the school cafeteria for members of the Institute on Tuesday and Thursdays for lunch, which brings us into almost the only contact we have all together.

There is a large number of students in attendance at the Institute, probably between sixty and seventy. About seven or eight of the students are Negroes, most of them being native

Africans, representing the Gold Coast, Nigeria, Belgian Congo, and South Africa (?). So far we students have not had as much opportunity as I should like to get acquainted with each other, but during the coming week we have at least one evening social event at which we shall all be present.

In the current of knowledge hovering about the Institute and its members I am getting a vague impression already of many of the more specific problems that are of great importance in the future of Africa and the world. These are so vague at present, however, that I should prefer stating them until they crystallize somewhat to me. So far there is little in the work of the Institute which is of direct or evening indirect bearing on American race problems. Most of our work promises to be in relation to modern Africa itself in its place in the modern world- strategic, economic, political, etc., and this may or may not having any bearing on race problems in the United States. As nearly as I can tell, the Institute represents a heartening number of people who are keenly interested in Africa and its problems.

There are many points of interest which I probably have ngglected entirely, but I shall try to jot them down for my next letter.

Thank you again for your kind extension of aid.

Yours very sincerely,

Dear Dr. Mitchell:

Just a note to tell you that I've gotten away to a whirlwind start in the Institute. It promises to be a real workout, but already is very interesting and helpful. There are many ways in which I would disagree with Dr. Herskovits on the organization of it, but they aren't going to seriously interfere with my getting an invaluable amount of good stuff.

I've written the letters to Mr. Tobias and Mr. Weisiger, and am enclosing copies in this letter. Also, and I'm embarrassed to have to admit it, I've lost Mr. Weisiger's address. Hence, I'm enclosing his letter in here also to ask you if you'll send it on or give it to him if you're in frequent contact. I'm very sorry to do such a thing, but it was either this or waiting until I could get his address back from you, delaying the letter well over another week after it's been delayed too long already. If you think it best that I send it to him, I'd appreciate your mailing it back to me with his address, in which case I'll send it on post haste.

The letters I write at the end of the term will be more complete than these, but I hope these will give Mr. Tobias and Mr. Weisiger some idea of how things look at the start.

Hope to hear from you soon, and to see you if you get up this way as you said you might.

Mr. George Mitchell,

ATLANTA 3,
GEORGIA...U.S.A.

Dear George Mitchell,

Thank you ever so much for sending on the tear-sheet entitled "City in Terror". The "Time" was banned in South Africa so I was very glad to see the article. Actually it is a very difficult thing to criticise because, although most of the facts are true, the emotional overtone is what matters. The quotation from the Institute appears to be rather un-Institute in its language - it was part of a Press Bulletin service that we give to Newspapers. Incidentally, it is not true that no white South African will suffer more than a fine if he should caught a Native under any circumstances.

It is a long time since we were in Atlanta enjoying your wife's hospitality and excellent dinner - I still remember that "pudding". Since I have returned to South Africa I seem to have been harried from pillar to post - partly by the situation; partly by the volume of very contentious legislation; partly by the very heavy demands made on us and partly certain internal organisational difficulties. So you must please forgive us both for appearing to be so neglectful. Actually, I have become a very good ambassador for America and I shall send you shortly copies of one or two addressed I have given since my return. People here consider that I am too optimistic about race relations both in North and South America, and that my picture is too brightly coloured. However, I found out that Liberals and Negroes alike were very optimistic. My only trouble is that both Liberals and Negroes are very American, very nationalist and therefore probably prone to present America favourably. I shall be writing you at much greater length some time soon - I hope. If you see Guy B. Johnson or Charles S. Johnson, please remember me to them and tell them that we are not the ~~integrates~~ ingrates we appear to be.

In the meantime, all good wishes to you both and I hope the Regional Council is finding its finances easier.

Yours sincerely,

Quintin Whyte.

Excerpt from letter of Sol Sutker (Oklahoma A&M College, Stillwater, Okla.), October 17, 1951

Another matter concerned your interest in setting up an African Institute. I have mulled the idea over and have no real suggestions, bright or otherwise. I presume you have thought of the Rockefeller brothers and their interest in developing the economic resources of various areas in Africa. They could be a possible source of funds. I was thinking of possible institutions that could serve as a location for such an institute. Perhaps the University of Louisville might be appropriate. I do not know what has happened there since Louisville Municipal College was eliminated. Tulane could be a possibility. Their sociology department is expanding and they are a private school. I am also listing the titles of three publications put out by the Social Science Research Council that are pertinent to this subject. If you have not seen them, perhaps you will want to examine them. They are:

Julian H. Steward, Area Research, Theory and Practice, Bulletin 63, 1950

Charles Wagley, Area Research and Training: A Conference Report on the Study of World Areas, Pamphlet 6, June, 1948

Dear Mr. Walter:

I greatly appreciate your letter. So nice to hear from somebody with the same interest.

Emmett Murphy's address is: 6401 South Kimbark, Chicago, Illinois. He is studying at the University of Chicago.

The Institute at Northwestern was organized by Mr. M. J. Herskovits. He very kindly sent me a complete file of the mimeographed summaries issued during the Institute. I tied them together and am mailing them to you. They are emphatically a loan, and I will be most grateful if you will get them back to me in a tolerably short while. It was impressed upon me by Murphy that the summaries were not public, but I am sure I do not trespass in sending them to you.

I have been trying to find somebody in the South who would put up money for an institute in some Southern city. It is a pity that hereabouts, where a third of our population is of African descent, no one shows the faintest interest in modern African affairs. Must say, I haven't had any luck, though I am still trying.

The New York Times a couple of weeks ago carried a notice that the Rockefeller Foundation had financed at McGill University an Institute of Islamic Studies. I have written the man at McGill for information.

I have been proceeding on the assumption that the State Department would like to be underpinned by three or four university departments or institutes scattered over the country, specializing separately in various fields of African knowledge—languages, anthropology, geography, history, etc. Left alone, the State Department would, I expect, be midwife to two or three such centers exclusively in the Northeast or Northcentral States. Let's join forces, and you push for one in the Southwest and I'll push for one in the Southeast.

I've had a nibble of interest in New Orleans.

Albuquerque is one of my desired destinations, but I don't know when I will ever get there again. Meanwhile, if you reach these parts, do come to Atlanta.

Dear Mr. Mitchell:

I have just read the article, "Our Stake in Africa," by Emmett J. Murphy in The New South. I would like very much to obtain further information on the Institute on Contemporary Africa held last summer at Northwestern University. Could you tell me who at Northwestern could give me such information, or could you give me the address of Mr. Murphy?

In a letter from Mr. Graham Young of the Union of South Africa, who has been traveling in this country, I learned that you are much interested in his idea of establishing a permanent Institute for the Study of African Affairs. I am also much interested in this idea, and would like to see it implemented as soon as possible, having in mind that perhaps one of the Foundations might help to finance such a venture. Apparently Mr. Young, himself, does not plan to take the initiative in the establishment of such an Institute, and I wonder if those of us who are interested might work out some kind of definite project.

I will appreciate greatly hearing from you.

Dear Mr. Gibbs:

I had intended to tell you about this young man, A. Babbs Fafunwa, 60 Cookman Hall, Bethune-Cookman College, Daytona Beach. He is president of a quite recently formed African Student Union. There are some 500 African students in this country. They pay their own way, meet some discouragement from the British they say, and, of course, have a difficult time because of the exchange. They come here for what Mr. Fafunwa described as a "World View." I met with the nine or ten who are at Bethune-Cookman. There are five more at Edward Waters and eight or so at Tallahassee.

It seemed to me that these young people's chances of getting a world view were not too good under present circumstances, and that we might all do something toward getting them invited for appearances at church or church missionary groups or for student gatherings.

Mr. Fafunwa himself is most presentable and well spoken. Tehir English is hard but with close attention, quite understandable.

If you can contrive anything that would add to the breadth of their educational experience in this country, I am sure you would be helping.

Sincerely,

George S. Mitchell

My dear Doctor Mitchell,

I am happy to write you at last. I heard from Mr Weisiger the other day and I am exceptionally happy to hear from him. His interest in our aspirations as a growing people is appreciated. As a matter of fact anybody who is a friend of Africa is a good friend of mine. Happily you are one.

May I express the sentiments of the group by saying 'thank you' for your call and we shall be earnestly looking forward to meet you whenever you come down to Daytona Beach or when we find our way across the Florida-Georgia line.

Thanks immensely for contacting the Universities and I hope they in turn will rise to the occasion.

I went to take the Graduate Record Examination at Stetson University the other day and I suffered many indignities despite my protest that I am a foreign student who was just there for two days for the exam. The manager of the Cafeteria on the campus told me he didn't care a mite from where I come. I am just colored and out I must go. I don't know, Dr Mitchell, but this is a very sorry affair. That's why I am not in the habit of leaving the campus for anywhere — to avoid any mental torture as a human being who has his dignity to protect. I only hope that things will change for the better in due course.

Kindly let us hear from you again. You can depend on it, if we have any problem or some other matters in which your help is needed, we shall not hesitate to ask.

Best wishes to your family and friends.

Yours sincerely

A. Babs Fafunwa

P.S.

Those pamphlets are very educational, interesting and encouraging. I wish your humanistic organization the best of luck.

Dear Dr. Mitchell,

It was a real pleasure to make your acquaintance today and to learn about the splendid work you folks are doing with the Southern Regional Council.

I am also very glad to know that a man with your background is taking the interest that you are in these problems. Personally, I don't think that a person can adequately understand the implications of the problems of Africa, for instance, without understanding the economic factors. There are not many people in Africa, who are working with missions and educational institutions, who have this understanding, in the areas I saw. I only spent three years in Africa, but I did get to visit most of the important educational centers.

I certainly hope that your plans for an African Affairs Council work out. It will not only help Africa, but will also help us look at some of our own problems and traditional thinking which needs revison at strategic points.

You asked me for the names and addresses of interested individuals:

Dr. Emory Ross, Africa Secretary, Foreign Missions Conf., 156 Fifth Ave., N.Y.

Dr. Eugene Smith, Executive Secretary, Methodist Bd. Missions, 150 Fifth Ave., N.Y.

Dr. Raymond Archer, Africa Sec., Methodist Board of Missions, 150 Fifth Ave., N.Y.

Dr. Richard Reuling, Africa Sec., American Bd. of Missions, 14 Beacon St., Boston.

Miss Sallie Lou MacKinnon, Africa Sec., Women's Division of the Methodist Board of Missions, 150 Fifth Ave., New York 11, N.Y.

Bishop Newell S. Booth, Methodist Bishop, Box 522, Elisabethville, Belgian Congo.

Bishop King, Methodist Bishop, Monrovia, Liberia

Bishop Harris, Episcopal Bishop, Monrovia, Liberia

Dr. Liston Pope, Dean, Yale Divinity School, Yale University, New Haven, Conn.

Dr. Channing Tobias, Phelps-Stokes Fund, in New York City (You probably have the address.)

These are the names and addresses that I can remember now. Later, I can help with other references. The people above are progressive Christian liberal leaders, and will be interested in your idea. Keep me in touch with your program. If I can help you in any other way, please let me know.

Mr. Morton McDonald

Deland, Florida

Dear Mr. McDonald:

On my last visit to Daytona, I made an opportunity go go out to Bethune-Cookman College and meet for a while with the ten or eleven students from Africa who are there. They are interesting young people, and, each, of course, represented enormous sacrifice by their parents. Passage is $750.00, the exchange is agains them, and the British don't want them to come over here. Too, they get no Fullbright Aid. They come for a "world view."

There are somewhere between four and five hundred of them in this country altogether. They had a convention at Bethune-Cookman last Christmas Time and set up an African Students Council, and elected one of the Bethune-Cookmen young poeple A. Babbs Fafunwa, as President. He is quite a presentable young man, speaks good English, and has good personsality and dignity.

As I traveled about Florida, I tried to reach a few people in church groups and in colleges who could do what might be possible to get some of these visitors into contact with American life in general. They could be asked to speak at missionary societies or at college religious gatherings or something of that sort. There are eight or nine more at Tallahassee and four or five at Edward Waters.

I had a letter today from Mr. Fafunwa thanking me for my visit. He went on to say that he had lately gone to Deland and taken the Graduate Record Examination at Stetson University and had suffered many indignities in spite of his protest that he was a foreign student just there two days for the examination. Accordingly, the Manager of the Cafeteria on the campus told him that he (the manager) did not care a mite from where he came, that he was just colored and out he must go. "I don't know, Dr. Mitchell but this is a very sorry affair. That's why I am not in the habit of leaving the campus for anywhere--to avoid any mental torture as a human being, who has his dignity to protect. I only hope that things will change for the better in due course."

Of course, I realize that at any given time these things are insoluable. Yet, it is possible by careful arrangement to provide a kind of courtesy. A good many southern white colleges worked it out in the early post war period whenNegro veterans were to be at campases having Veterans Service Centers where veterans of any race in certain catagories were to take vocations tests, etc.; I believe the Veterans Administration, by contact with the college, arranged that lodging and entertainment would be available for Negro veterans on campasses where they were remote from town

I merely take the liberty of writing this to you as one who I know is sincere and will share concern. I never advocate a stir in these matters, but I thought that, perhaps, by letting you know about it, you might in some quiet way contrive this or that that would for future contacts ease the problem for students.

Thank you very much for sending me a copy of your note on the African student survey. We are glad to report that there have been some very constructive steps taken as a result of it and the affairs of the African students seem to be becoming more and more organized. The various West African Governments are appointing welfare officers for the students to be attached to the British Embassy here in Washington, and the Institute of International Education is setting up a separate division to assist the students. In addition, financial assistance is being offered by the West African Governments and by private groups in this country.

Dear Ocie Lee:

I have just been out on a longish trip and am most pleased to find the two shingles that you have added to our leaky roof.

I was in New York and went to see a gal named Ruth Haines, who is connected with the Committee on Friendly Relations among Foreign Students, at 291 Broadway, New York. It seems to be hooked on to the YMCA. I told her that I and our people would try to be helpful over the South, particularly on African students in Southern colleges.

"Well and good," she said, "and please try to ease the situation of the African students at Pine Bluff.

I don't know just what is wrong at Pine Bluff, but evidently there has been some difficulty about one, two, or more of the African students.

Could you lend an ear and tell me what you hear? I thought perhaps I could write to some appropriate members of ours (white) thereabouts and ask, and you try to arrange home hospitality or church hospitality for some of the students.

Nigerian student injured in pub

Hit on head, kicked out

by David Zimmerman

Analiefo Adibuah, a Nigerian UC student in mathematical biophysics, received injuries to his lips and mouth last Friday night when he was beaten while making a purchase at the Drexel Pub, 855 E. 55th street.

Adibuah, in a MAROON interview Tuesday, said that he entered the tavern shortly after 11:30 p.m. Friday and ordered several bottles of ginger-ale from the bartender, John Carrol.

While his order was being filled, said Adibuah, a customer down the bar aimed several derogatory remarks about "niggers" in his direction. Before picking up his purchase, Adibuah turned to see who was making the comments.

At this point, the customer lunged at him saying, "Who do you think you are looking at, nigger?" He then attacked Adibuah, attempting to push him off his feet. Adibuah resisted, until he saw the bartender coming toward them. Thinking that the bartender was coming to his aid, he attempted to pick up his package and leave.

Carrol, the bartender, then struck him in the back of the head, and when Adibuah turned around, Carrol hit him in the face, splitting his lips and loosening a front tooth.

Pushed into street

The blow knocked Adibuah against the bar. He was then pushed bodily into the street by Carrol.

(Carrol, in an interview with the MAROON Monday, maintained, that Adibuah's story was completely false and that Adibuah had started the incident when he "called the white guy names.")

(Adibuah, Carroll claimed, put down his packages, and "started swinging at him (the customer)." Carrol also said that Adibuah hit him, and that he had a scar between his eyes where he had been hit.)

Later that night, accompanied by his roommates, Chimere Ikoku and Mr. Chuke Arah, and a guest, UC student Henry Finck, Adibuah returned to the bar in order to find out why the attack was made.

Upon entering the bar, the bartender grabbed Adibuah by the

Two more judges named to Court; Kahn made chief

SG Tuesday filled the remaining student seats on the Student-Faculty-Administration Court by electing Haskell Deutsch (Social Sciences), for a two-year term and David Kahn (Law) for a one-year term.

Charlotte Toll, who was elected last week, and Frank Logan and Herbert Vetter, who retain office from last year, are the other student justices.

David Kahn was chosen chief justice.

Representing the administration on the court will be Mrs. Ruth McCarn, assistant dean of students. The two faculty justices have not yet been selected.

The court, which was established last year as an agency of the Student Government Assembly, has jurisdiction over " all cases arising under the Statute of the Powers of Student Government and the operation thereof upon the student organizations."

NSA starts investigation

The National Student Association will begin its investigation of the MAROON'S suspension Monday at 2:30 p.m. when Sylvia Bacon, NSA vice-president in charge of student affairs, will conduct an open hearing on campus. Miss Bacon will be accompanied by two other representaives from the association.

Action taken on campus

Action on the beating suffered by UC student Analiefo Adibuah last Friday night in a 55th street tavern is being taken by several groups on campus including the Administration, SG, the House Council of International House and the Committee to Combat Race Discrimination Against Foreign Students at UC, a group formed Monday when a group of interested American and foreign students met at Adibuah's home.

Mrs. Ruth McCarn, assistant dean of students, said, in a MAROON interview, "I assured them (Adibuah and Finck) . . . the dean of students office would do everything it could to see they were treated justly. . . . We are supporting them by our presence in court. (William Birenbaum, director of student activities, attended the trial as UC administration representative and said that he would also be at the continuation.) We do this for any student who is in trouble."

SG passes resolution

SG is acting on a resolution brought up by James Goodfriend and Arthur Bierman and passed at the Tuesday night meeting. The resolution states ". . . the Student Government Civil Liberties Committee in conjunction with the Executive Council shall investigate the facts. If the facts . . . are determined to be (sufficient to) warrant student action, the committee shall consider the following remedial measures and take steps to effectuate those which they deem appropriate: (the first three measures include sending letters to tavern owners and to Alderman Merriam, and recommending boycott of the tavern by UC students until the policy of the tavern is changed.

"4) That any or all of the following recommendations be submitted to the University administration: that the administration advise the Hyde Park police captain of the position of the University . . . that the administration apply . . . 'social sanctions' . . . against the owners . . . that the administration grant legal aid and assistance to all foreign students."

Urge action on slugging

Last Friday night a Nigerian student Analiefo Adibuah, was insulted by a patron in the Drexel Pub at 55th and Drexel while making a purchase and then physically attacked by the bartender as he prepared to leave with his package. When he returned with two other Nigerian students and a white student to identify the assailant, he and the white student were attacked by the bartender again and pursued down the street by the patron, who brandished a broken beer bottle and threatened to kill them.

They are attempting to prosecute their attackers through the police and the courts.

The MAROON thinks that the urgency of action on this issue will need little pressing with UC students once the facts are known. We urge the following immediate actions:

By the Student Government:

1. Condemn the act of racist violence.

2. Urge the University of Chicago administration to aid the students legally in the prosecution of the case.

3. Declare a boycott of the tavern until the bartender involved is fired and guarantees made that no such acts will occur in the future.

4. Reinstate and widely publicize the "Shop at the Sign of the 'C'" campaign. (Two years ago SG carried on a campaign to "Shop at the Sign of the 'C'," i.e., stores that proudly displayed a University "C" to demonstrate that they are non-discriminatory.)

5. Demand full cooperation with the students by the police in prosecuting the case.

By individual students:

1. Go to the tavern in person to protest.

2. Call Alderman Merriam and the police and demand that justice be done.

By the University of Chicago administration:

1. Give legal aid to the students in the prosecution of the case.

2. Announce a firm policy of fighting against discrimination and segregation in University-owned property in the community.

3. Actively join in the work of community groups striving to prevent such incidents.

4. Apply pressure to the police to insure their cooperation with the students in prosecuting the attackers.

We feel that since the police have shown indications of apathy or downright obstructionism towards this case, pressure in the form of telephone calls to the police department (Hyde Park Station—HY 3-0311) is especially important to insure that justice is done.

There has been an act of discrimination, an act of violence. Now it is up to those who believe in freedom and equality to fight and fight hard for their beliefs.

Dear Dr. Mitchell,

Very highly impressed by the urgency of your writing me after your departure from here. Infact, I never expected your letter at that time or even without my having written first as I did promise. This idea of your early writing coupled with the issues of the magazines sent have proved to me that you are really interested in Africa and its affairs as I have imagined from talking with you the other day. I can never forget the enjoyment I had from your speech.

I have read and re-read the magazines and still never got tired because of the interesting facts that they contain. I have passed them to my friends (both Africans and Americans), and the Americans expressed their surprise over the exposed hidding facts.

Regarding coming over there as you have suggested, that will be grant and nice. Personally, I like to visit other states and have general idea of the country but to do so, costs so much that I can't afford. I have spent my two summer vacation (since arrival) here; and I'm planning to travl this coming summer but it will be where I will find some job inorder to defray the cost of the trip and also to pay for other expense that I will have to face in fall. We have about seven days off for the Easter. But I don't think it will pay me come then.

I will like to hear from you as often as possible.

Dear Kendall:

Slight change in plans.

The Delta Lines boat due to sail from Monrovia May 15 sailed May 13, and Kotun could not catch it, having certain formalities still to complete. Next boat sails from Monrovia, same line, May 30. Kotun will catch it. It is due at New Orleans June 18 or 19.

Could you make your kind arrangements for your friend in New Orleans to meet Kotun on that arrival? Cancel the earlier one, for Kotun will not be on it.

Kotun is to come on up to Atlanta, and we here will steer him toward the supposed job in northern New Jersey where his friends will be.

Many thanks.

Sincerely,

George S. Mitchell

MEMORANDUM June 20, 1952

Re: Victor B. Kotun

Destination--Bird's Eye Snider General Food Corperation, Mount Morris, N. Y.

He will join his friend Nathaniel Olaku, there. Mt. Morris is 36 miles south of Rochester. A convenient bus ride from Rochester.

Various ways of getting there:

(1) Ride any train that would put him at the railroad station at Newark, N. J. on or before 9:30 a. m. on any day. He could then ride from Newark in train operated by the Delaware Lackawana Ry, which train is called Phoebe Snow. Leaves Newark 9:43 a. m., EST. Arrives Mt. Morris, N. Y., 4:41 p. m. I have not determined whether the DL&W leaves Newark from the same station that the Pennsylvania RR uses. It's quite possible that it's from some jerkwater station, which would be a very serious matter getting him across Newark, and so on.

(2) Ride a plane operated by Capital Airlines on direct flight from Atlanta to Rochester. Fare, including tax, is $60.72. Leaves Atlanta 12:30p. m., arrives Rochester 6:18 p. m., EDST.

(3) Less desirable alternative--ride Capital Airlines plane to Pittsburgh. Leaves Atlanta 12:40 p. m., arrives Pittsburgh 3:52 p. m. At Pittsburgh he would have to undertake a long, difficult bus journey to Mt. Morris.

Olaku hopes that Kotun will haul up to Rochester for Olaku, Olaku's trunk box, now sitting in storage at Morehouse College. I have an arrangement with Mrs. Archer, Rm. 112, Gray's Hall, Morehouse College, underwhich she will, during ordinary business hours, very kindly rouse up certain other Morehouse students and fetch forth Olaku's trunk box. Her telephone number is WA 1353.

Imperative! Before Kotun leaves Atlanta he must be fetched over to the office of the Social Security Administration in the Atlanta Journal Bldg., Rm. 603, where he is to obtain a Social Security card. He can't work up there without having a card.

He can leave surplus baggage of his own in GSM's garage or at Morehouse.

(4) Of course, we could put him on a bus here, and he would eventually reach his destination, but that would be a most unpleasant way to travel. Too, he makes about $8 or $10 a day, and every day he delays getting up there means less salary for him.

Dr. L. P. Redding

Dear Mr. White:

This is a preliminary letter to open the question of the possibility of the Men's Club at Plymouth Church assisting an African student with a $350 loan.

One of the most likeable and interesting of the ten or twelve African students at Atlanta University is my friend Mr. Olaku. He has charmed everyone with his friendliness, ability, and his devotion to the cause of Nigerian independence and progress. Olaku has a dear friend whom Olaku is most anxious to assist in coming over to this country to study. The friend's name is Victor Bolakale Kotun. He and Olaku were at school together. Kotun is from Lagos in Nigeria. I have been shown a photograph of Kotun. Judging from it, he's a nice looking fellow.

Kotun, in laying a long-range plan to get to this country to study, went up to Liberia last year, took a teaching job 45 miles in the interior from Monrovia (at a mission school), and acquired Liberian citizenship. (Okalu tells me it is quite difficult for more than a tiny trickle of Nigerians to get British agreement to their coming to this country to study.)

Kotun has taught seven of the eight months of the school year. He gets paid for eight months only. He has saved $117, which, at Liberian mission school teaching salaries, is pretty good. It will take most of that to get his passport and a visa and the rest of the arrangings.

Olaku and a friend Olatunje have a job for this summer packing Birdseye food in New Jersey. Good-paying, hard work. They will save several hundred dollars each during the summer. They hope Kotun can get a May 15 boat and arrive over here in time to join them for the summer's work. In the fall Kotun would enter Morehouse College. Kotun has the equivalent of a high school education, some college work, and has done a year's teaching.

Kotun needs to borow $400 in order to pay for his passage here. Olaku, though poor as a church mouse, will put up $50. Olaku and Kotun guarantee to repay the $350 at the end of the summer.

I have not yet inquired into the details of Kotun's financing at Morehouse, but suppose that Mr. Mays is providing scholarship aid. Word on that later.

We have hereabouts in Atlanta Kendall Weisiger, who has managed for years for Rotary International a magnificent international scholarship aid program. Kendall knows the ins and outs of every scholarship and foreign student proposition. Kendall, however, is away at Augusta and doesn't get back for a week. I want Kendall's full discussion of this proposition and approval of it before I make any formal request to your Men's Club to root around and see if they could find $350. Kendall might have an alternative scholarship resource, or he might know things that I do not concerning passports and visas and so on.

Meanwhile, however, I would be very grateful if this letter might stand as preliminary notice that, on behalf of Mr. Kotun, I may be asking for help as indicated.

Sounds pretty cold from this far away. But these young people are part of a deadly earnest effort of the youth of that continent to train themselves for service to their whole people. And that is worth some strain for the rest of us.

I am still recalling with pleasure my visit with you and with your people.

Your Men's Club will be pleased to know that RACE AND LAW ENFORCEMENT, which they helped with so generously, is into its third printing and continues to move in good, big blocks to organizations all over the South. I sold 75 day before yesterday at a meeting of Region IV of the National Council of Negro Women, and they undertook to send committees to see the chief in many of their cities.

MEMO TO MR. OLAKU May 7, 1952
FROM GEORGE S. MITCHELL

I have today borrowed from the Citizens Trust Company, on my own personal signature, $200, on a four-months' note, repayable in the sum of $204 on September 4, 1952. This will be cabled with the balance to Mr. Kotun tomorrow.

Mr. J. B. Blayton has undertaken a one-third responsibility with me toward the repayment of this note in the event of failure by Mr. Kotun to repay me.

I wish to impress upon you and upon Mr. Kotun the critical importance of paying me well before September 4, 1952, the sum of $204.

I am also advancing, from my personal funds, $50, which sum is likewise repayable to me from Mr. Kotun. But I am agreeable on that $50 to postponing repayment until approximately December 1, 1952.

Dear Kendall:

That's very kind of you to offer to get Victor Bolakale Kotun onto the same basis with the others.

Here is how we financed his transportation:

Personal loan from John H. Eaves, Morehouse College	$ 15.00
Personal loan from Nathaniel Olaku, Morehouse College	67.00
Personal loan from G. S. Mitchell, address as above	50.00
Personal loan from G. S. Mitchell, who in turn borrowed this sum ($200) from the Citizens Trust Company, on G. S. Mitchell's note, due September 4, 1952	200.00
Chi Phi Chapter of Phi Beta Sigma Fraternity, Morehouse College	68.00
TOTAL	$400.00

This sum was cabled to Kotun May 8, with Nathaniel Olaku as the sender.

Kotun is expected to leave Monrovia on a ship of the Delta Lines May 15, arriving in New Orleans about June 1. We are all most grateful for your kind willingness to have Mr. Mitchell at New Orleans meet Mr. Kotun, and provide him with transportation to Atlanta. That will be a real service, and a lot of help.

Olaku and I understand that you will arrange with Kotun when he arrives for him to give notes for his travel indebtedness to the Rotary Educational Fund, and that when the Fund has been paid by Kotun, the Fund will reimburse the several creditors; namely, Olaku, John H. Eaves, G. S. Mitchell, the Chapter of the Fraternity, and the Fund itself. Another most kind service, and one that has the altogether desirable feature of putting Mr. Kotun on an even basis with the other students.

Sincerely,

George S. Mitchell

P. S. As to kotun, Mr. Mays has promised a four years' tuition scholarship at Morehouse, and Mr. R. O. Johnson has undertaken to provide lodging and meals for up to four years.

Dear Kendall:

All praise to you and the Rotary Educational Foundation of Atlanta for handling Bokale Kotun so well.

I am very sorry I missed him, and it is a comfort to have your cordial appraisal of him.

His close friend, Olaku, has left the Birdseye place, saying there was racial discrimination, poor food, and a high price for the food, and has a job at a YWHA camp fifty miles up the Hudson River at Cold Spring, New York. I have advised Olaku that Kotun is at the Birdseye place. I hope Kotun settles down there and makes out all right.

Many thanks for getting Kotun's note. And everyone is grateful to you for putting up the extra fifty dollars. When and if Kotun begins to send down money, have you some facilities for holding it until it begins to be in a lump? If not, send it on bit by bit, and I will keep accounts.

When you behold your sponsoree - Bolakale Kotun - I am sure you will be as pleased as I have been with him. He is well appearing and he has a disarming grace that will win friends for him everywhere.

We had a difficult time in advantageously routing his journey to Rochester but finally put him on a train last night bound for Rochester and the nearby Birdseye.

I hold his note for $450 and he will make weekly remittances from his pay. These I shall transmit to you. The $50 was to cover his railroad fare and meals en route and this I advanced to him.

You have certainly wrought far better than you have thought!

BRIGHTLY SHINES OUR LITTLE LIGHT !

There are two aspects of the program of Districts 240 and 241 for International Student Exchange:-

(1) That we should successfully handle the task imposed by the District Conferences;
(2) That we could set a pattern that other districts would come to emulate.

Both of these objectives have now been achieved. (1) Our sponsorship of as many as 135 students from 33 countries has set a record throughout Rotary. Our program has grown in size and popularity during the past six years. (2) Rotary International has finally recognized the value of such a program, and is now commending it to Rotary throughout the world.

In addition to the per-capita offering made by all the clubs in both districts, as many as 28 clubs have joined in the sponsorship of individual students. These are:

Americus	Dalton	Rome
Atlanta	Dawson	Savannah
Augusta	Decatur	Statesboro
Blakely	Eastman	Summerville-Trion
Cairo	Gainesville	Thomasville
Cartersville	Griffin	Thomson
Carrollton	Hawkinsville	Valdosta
Columbus	Marietta	Waycross
Cuthbert	Milledgeville	West Point
	Monroe

It must be remembered that our students have not only done well scholastically, but each has a distinct post-college objective of recognized social, educational, economic, or governmental value.

Not only have the Rotarians enjoyed the sponsorship of these splendid students, but a great many people throughout our State have come, through flesh and blood relations with them, to have a deeper feeling for international friendship and good will, and to realize, as never before, the universality of all mankind.

Dear Mr. Weisiger:

Since my recent arrival from Africa at New Orleans my very short visit to the Morehouse campus in Atlanta and my arrival here I have certainly covered a great deal of ground. I began work on the day I arrived at the Birdseye Division of the General Food Corporation.

Thank you so much for making all the arrangements for my journey, for providing the transportation, for the large box of food which kept me nourished all the way to Rochester.

Now I have to thank you greatly for all you have done in my behalf. All these made deep impression in my mind. In fact, it has brought me so much satisfaction in my life. I was satisfied because here you are an American mind of a different cast who does not want just to possess a beautiful home, just to bluff others, just to point fingers on those act of the stage of life but to be a vital instrument to be used as a stepping stone, by we the under dogs.

I am praying for the spirit that is of you praying that we have plenty of you in this world. I realized the yeoman sacrifice you people are rendering us in this battling for the revival of the stature of man in Africa and that Africa will not forget your contributions toward our cause.

Truly I could scarcely say a word, when I was with you to express my gratitude but with a deep sense of appreciation I say thank you very, very much. May the Lord be with you always.

To apply on my transportation which Mr. Mitchell so generously provided I am sending you money orders each week as I receive my pay. You can rest assured that I shall live up to your expectations. I am working very hard.

I hope you are doing well and keeping fit.

Mr. Nathaniel Olaku

Dear Olaku:

Many thanks for two letters, June 15 and June 25.

I held the June 15 one waiting for Kotun. My week in town at the time of his stated arrival came and went, and I was in Florida when at last he showed hereabouts on, say, June 25. He found his way to Mr. Reddick's care on the first night. Next morning the girls here in the office advised him on getting his social security card, which he got. Mr. Reddick, or somebody, got him in touch with Kendall Weisiger. Kendall wrote me June 27 that he, Kendall, had been well pleased with Kotun as "well appearing and with a disarming grace that will win friends for him everywhere."

Kendall said they had a hard time working out the journey to Rochester, but did on the night of June 20 put Kotun on a train bound for Rochester and Birdseye. Kendall loaned Kotun an additional fifty dollars to cover Kotun's railroad fare and meals to Rochester. Kendall caused Kotun to sign a note for $450, and Kendall said Kotun would make weekly remittances from Kotun's pay to Weisiger. Weisiger said he would transmit the payments to me. I will tell Weisiger to hold them until they amount to sizeable lumps.

All of that, naturally, before your letter of June 25 came in.

My office knew when Kotun arrived that you had called Reddick and said you had moved, and that Kotun was to go to New York City. My office gave Kotun the address of the man you said he should see in New York City. But Kendall Weisiger says he put Kotun on the train for Rochester. I do hope the two of you get together.

We urged Kotun to take your trunk box up yonder, but we do not know whether Kotun did or not.

Mr. Olaku, June 30, 1952

I am coming to New York City, to be there July 8 and 9. I appear at a meeting arranged by the National Scholarship Service and Fund for Negro Students, 31 West 110th Street (up near Columbia), telephone ENright 9-6868. The head of the show is Mr. Richard L. Plaut. I may drive, and if I do, and if I can find the time, I will go on up to your neck of the woods and try to dig you out of Cold Springs.

We all did the best we could, and we hope it works somehow.

Finding you a room up near Columbia is going to be tough, but I could give you some advice on where to start. A guy named Bob Carey, who is a kind of dean at Columbia College, Hamilton Hall, at Columbia University, 116th Street, would try to be helpful. So also would Professor Horace Taylor, who teaches economics in Hamilton Hall. Or if you could find him, a professor Dwight Minor. Failing any of those, go to see the chaplain at Columbia University or his new assistant. Their office would be in Earl Hall. The first several men I have mentioned are all my friends.

Dear Dr Mitchell,

I know you will be surprised to read from me from this end since I wrote you last from Mt. Morris. I left because of a question of racial discrimination and too much cost in food. Imagine $12.85 per week for food and it does not even work the above value. I was refused job for 5 days and I had to leave for New York City on Saturday the 21st with two of my fraternity brothers there at Mt. Morris paying my way down.

I arrived in the city on Sunday and through the influence of one of our boys from West Africa, I got this job after paying him the last $7 I had on me out of the $20 I got from the boys in Mount Morris.

This job is very interesting and it gives me a chance to participate in the camp life although I am a dish washer, yet, I am at liberty to take part in swimming, ball playing, movie showing, acting, group discussion and things of like nature. I hope to get every month $120 and the search will end by September 1st or 2nd.

I should be grateful if you and Mrs Wersiegs could help to get Kolun a job in Atlanta, for example a nursing orderly in an hospital so that we could take care of the loan before the due date. As soon as I get my pay by end of July, I want to pay off the $68 of my fraternity so that the brothers could get all their requirements by Fall. He should be able to save something close to $200 by end of August. If he works during the day and wait table in the night for work in the Library of A.U. for the summer school, he should be very close to it. Let me know what you think of this idea and what has been done so far and his arrival in Atlanta. I shall write Dr Leddick tonight too.

My Dear Dr Mitchell:

I am sure you must have been expecting some lines from me. We arrived here on the 6th and got to work on the 9th. The situation and the experiences have been very interesting both on the way and since my arrival.

Since Bola Katum should be getting to your end sometime this week, I think I should acquaint you with the procedure. I am suggesting that you help to see that he takes a train to Rochester, N.Y. and from there he could either take another train or bus to this end. Rochester is 36 miles from here. It is imperative that he gets a social security card from the Atlanta Journal-Constitution building so that there would be no delay as to his starting work. All plans have been made. Thanks a million for these yeoman services. I plan as soon as I get my check next Saturday to settle John Eaves' account after which we shall together jump on the Fraternity's. You should be hearing from us as to the $1204 Bank loan sometime early in July.

Please inform Bola to try and see if he could bring up my trunk box from Morehouse College, Trunk Room along with him. The fellows at Morehouse attending Summer school would help in this case.

As to the question of my graduate studies, I have finally decided on N.Y.U. School of Business. The problem I am confronted with now is to find a convenient and suitable accommodation to lodge in. The International House would not meet my needs. I plan to stay near Columbia U and take subway to school everyday. Do you have any suggestion as to whom I may contact? Your comments on this will be greatly appreciated. Please thank Mr Weisegar for his own efforts too. God will surely reward you people in copious measures.

I appreciate the contents of Mrs Mitchell and Miss Mitchell's letters. They are great. I wish I could get the chance of enjoying more the fellowship of you and your family. My hearty regards to all. Please let me hear from you sometime.

I find myself a victim of a sad habit that I deplore: and that is the habit of a literate deliberately failing to write you since you left us. Nevertheless it must be better now than never. Do pardon the offence which has been nursed by the putting off till tomorrow that which might have duly been accomplished today.

May I record here therefore my appreciation for all you have done and are still doing to influence my ~~brast~~ future. It was quite a pleasure to have met you and hope some day, I shall be in a better position to repay you. You are so nice.

Dear Olaku,

Very many thanks for your and Kotun's hard-earned $114. It is salted down against the fatal September 4, when the note is due. And thanks for forecast on the remaining $90. Your plans are excellent, and I only hope that carrying them out doesn't leave the two of you flat broke.

Air lane fare from Atlanta to Portland, Via Chicago and United Air Lines from there totals 169.40. I shouldn't be surprised but what you could do it for 90 or so from New York on some non-schedule line. Flying time Atlanta-Portland, via Chicago, 10 hours.

When you come here to go to Fort Valley let me know and I can more than likely drive you down to Fort Valley and back.

In re Ajanaku. Kendall Weisiger is well disposed toward finding loan-money for his passage. Have Ajanaku write you what ships he can get passage on, on what lines, sailing at what dates, and at what costs, to what ports, between September and January, and Kendall will consider whether he could find the loan money.

My apologies for not having answered Kotun's very nice letter. Just been busy, but haven't been unmindful of the two of you.

I am happy to do you what small kindnessms I can here, so call on my, to save you time, when you need to.

My Dear Dr Mitchell:

I am sure you must be expecting to hear from me as to how we are doing on the loan of $204 from the Bank through you.

I must be frank that it is the grace of God and also your confidence that are actually helping us through. The situation has been tough, but now we are happy to say we shall see our through before the dead-line.

The two of us have been fortunate about a week ago in getting jobs through a union which actually help our cause. Kotun is bagging about $40 net a week while nine is about $47 net. In order not to disappoint you and thereby disappoint myself and in my sincere love for friend, I have been sharing part of the burden right from the beginning. I am happy to do this because the grace of God is with us all the time and we are not discouraged inspite of our difficulties.

This is how the balance of $90 will be cleared after the deductions of the two money orders enclosed - totaling $114:

On Wednesday the 27th by God's power we shall send $55 and on Saturday the 30th of August the balance of $35 would be sent which I hope would reach you by Tuesday the 2nd of September.

I appreciate the confidence you have in me and you will find me in my own little way trying to live up to my word.

It is very important that I should seek your help again in getting Mr Wiesager to make the Rotary International help pay the passage of one of our boys who is going to study education. I am adopting the same method like that of Kotun. I am contacting Dr Troup of Fort Valley State College on this and try to get a scholarship with room and board. I am sure the boy's qualifications will speak for him and I will be willing to make my widow's mite contribution in case the Rotary should desire same. I must have to see this boy's case through with the help of God because he is as dear to me as Kotun and my relatives at home have made references to this to prove my sincerity and friendship to one who was ~~been~~ with me during thick and thin at home when others have deserted me. I must be frank, Dr., I am obligated to this cause, I cannot shun it. I get God's grace through this as he is helping me in all ways in this country.

I am thinking of going to U. of Washington in Seattle as soon as my papers and arrangements are through. It is cheaper there than N.Y.U with $2400 a year and I could get relatively the something up there. If everything works out well, I hope to see you in Atlanta by the 22nd of September where I must finalize my immigration arrangements and also rush to Fort Valley State College to see that the whole matter is settled as it is our intention to see that the boy, Akin OLAMIJU AJANAKU starts here early in January for the second semester, if not before.

I believe in yours and Mr Weisegger's support in this arduous task. You may hint him on this project so that when I bump into the two of you in Atlanta, a decision could be reached before going on my way to the North-West.

Would you please help to check on the cost of plane travel from Atlanta to Portland, Oregon and the number of hours the flight will take? (early) I have to stop there for two or three days before going to school.

Bola Ratum and I send our hearty greetings to you, your family, Mr Weisegger and the staff of Southern Regional Council. Good luck and please let me hear from you soon.

Yours sincerely

Mr. Victor B. Kotun
611 W. 113th St., Apt. 43-C
New York, N. Y.

Dear Mr. Kotun:

My apologies for not answering your earlier letter, and my much praise and thanks for your kindness and for writing August 29 with the full and final payment of the sum of $204. I have sent in a check to the Citizens Trust Company to discharge my note to them, which, by their notice to me, was not, in any case, due until September 7. But it is a comfort to me, as I am sure it is to you, to know that that obligation is met, and fully met, and met ahead of time.

You acted like a man on that, and I appreciate it. The more, because I am sure it was a hard-won $204.

Count me your friend when you get back. Call me up or come here to the office in your first few days, please.

Sincerely,

Dear Dr. Mitchell,

I wrote several weeks ago but my letter was not favored with a reply. However, I do hope you are in the best of health.

Enclosed, please find a money order to the value of $90 (Ninety dollars) This is the balance of the $114 sent couple of days ago. I am glad that through hard working, we are able to meet the deadline for the loan.

School begins on Sept 14, I understand, I will still have to work for two weeks before coming to Atlanta. This will enable me to save some money for my transportation books, and to defray other incidentals which my scholarship does not cover. I will see you as soon as I get to Atlanta.

Hope you are well. We do realize the woman sacrifice you are rendering us in this battling for the revival of the stature of man in Africa and hope someday, we shall be better disposed to repay you.

With best wishes and kindest regards,

Dany

Sincerely yours,

Dear Kendall:

You will be pleased to know that Mr. Victor B. Kotun completed yesterday payment to me of the sum of $204, advanced him for his passage to this country, and I have paid off the note that I had with Citizens Trust Company in that amount.

I am told that Kotun had only intermittent employment this summer, and I am sure, therefore, that his courteous and perfectly prompt payments were made only at considerable sacrifice.

I have written President Mays with my praise of this performance by this young student. I think he is a good bet.

Everyone is grateful to you and to the Rotary Educational Service for helping Kotun.

President Benjamin E. Mays
Morehouse College

Dear Dr. Mays:

A word of praise for one of your incoming African students.

It will be recalled that in June Mr. Nathaniel Olaku negotiated with various people to secure admittance to Morehouse and passage to this country of his close friend, Victor B. Kotun. I had a hand in raising $250 of the passage money, most of which I obtained by a note with the Citizens Trust Company. Mr. Kotun was to pay off the note toward the end of this summer. He kept in touch with me during the summer, informed me ahead of time of each payment that he would make, and sent down the sum in full several days before the expiration of the note.

I know that his employment this summer was intermittent only, and that the steepish payments could have been made only at the cost of very considerable sacrifice by him, and probably also by his friend Olaku. I think it should go down on his record that he performed in this matter with most perfect courtesy and integrity.

Dear Mr. Blayton:

Small item of good news!

You will remember your real kindness last June in taking on a contingent liability in the matter of a loan I obtained from the Citizens Trust Company of $204, to finance in part the passage money to this country for Mr. Victor B. Kotun, a Nigerian student wishing to enter Morehouse College.

Mr. Kotun sent me yesterday the final installment of the complete amount of $204, and I have now discharged entirely the note with the Citizens Trust Company. So that your conscience can be clear of any remote liability in the matter.

Mr. Kotun met his obligation on time or ahead of time, and did it, I am sure, at the cost of very great sacrifice during irregular summer employment in New York City. All praise to him.

Dear Dr. Mitchell,

Dean Brazeal told me that you called at the campus this morning. I'm sorry I did not get to see you. It was ~~How~~ nice of you to have stopped by.

I got in on Sunday night. We were busy with Registration ~~and~~ (Monday & Tuesday) and that kept me so busy. Classes began yesterday.

I wanted to come to your office but did not know how to get there by bus. I checked through the Directory to see if I could get your office Phone No. but did not. Hope to see you anyhow.

If I know your office hours, I shall try to call there one afternoon. My classes run from 8 00 am – 12 40 pm (Monday through Saturday). That made it impossible for me to see you during the morning hours.

Hope you are well. Thus with best regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,
Victor B. Koturn.

P.S. I might mention that I stay with Dr. R. O. Johnson at 1155 Fountain Dr. S.W.

Mr. N. Oluwole Olaku
Apt. 43-C
York Studios
611 W. 113th St.
New York 25, N. Y.

Dear Olaku:

Some people to see:

(1) Mr. Channing Tobias, Phelps-Stokes Fund, 101 Park Avenue, New York. As you know, the Phelps-Stokes Fund has long had an interest in African matters, and one of the things Mr. Tobias has done is to make arrangements for what assistance could be had for the needs of African students in this country. I do not know of any instances in which the Phelps-Stokes Fund has itself helped in these matters lately, but Tobias knows all of the people who might help.

The YMCA, at its headquarters in New York City, operates some kind of international student aid fund that does help stranded students from Africa. The YMCA's office is 291 Broadway. On their downstairs directory you will find listed some sort of international student aid committee.

Robert Carey, Student Dean, Hamilton Hall, Columbia College, Columbia University. That is near the northeast corner of 116th and Amsterdam. Statue of Alexander Hamilton on the corner. Bob Carey is my old friend, and he will give you good advice, though he has no money.

The Carnegie Foundation also operates some kind of student service business. Tobias or his office would know all about it. The Carnegie people will say that they don't make loans to individuals. But if they liked you, I am pretty sure they could get you some help.

Last resort: Richard Plaut, National Scholarship Service and Fund for Negro Students, 31 W. 110th St., New York. Concerned only with a scholarship program for U.S.A. students. Only a cousinly interest in our problem. But Richard Plaut, who runs it, is widely informed and influential, and could pull some strings for you.

Mr. Olaku, Oct. 3, 1952

On Weisiger: better if you write him yourself, direct. He would probably consult me, and I would advise him aright. But I have asked him for so many favors lately, I hesitate to bring up your problem myself with him.

Still another last resort: Robert W. Hudgens, Director, American International Association for Economic and Social Development, 45 Rockefeller Plaza, Room 968; or his assistant, James G. Maddox; or another assistant, Arthur McLawhon. No direct connection with your kind of need, but influential people, and all three my close friends.

Still another: Dig up Horace Cayton. Writes a column for various Negro newspapers. I think lives in Brooklyn. Any Negro newspaper could put you in touch with him. My close friend. And could explain to you all the ins and outs of Negro New York and America.

You would do no harm in looking up again my friend Harry Wright. Business address: 271 W. 125th St. Home address: 2171 Madison Ave., Apt. 5-E. You remember you and Kotun and I went to his home one evening. He never has any money himself, but he knows a lot of people.

TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN:

This will introduce Mr. N. Oluwole Olaku.

I got to know Mr. Olaku during his undergraduate career at Morehouse College in Atlanta University. He is an exceptionally able and promising student. He has gone on now to New York University for graduate work, and unexpectedly confronts a stoppage of funds from home.

I vouch in every way for his seriousness of purpose, quickness of mind, and financial integrity. I have fresh proof of this latter, from the circumstance that I myself in June advanced $200 toward passage money to this country of an intimate friend of Olaku's. The friend, in good measure with Olaku's own aid, repaid the $200, on the nail, from proceeds of summer employment in New York City. This was a difficult operation for these two young men, and it was much to their credit that they carried it through as covenanted.

Olaku is richly worth every aid that can be contrived for his further education.

My Dear Dr. Mitchell,

Thanks a lot for the fine reception and aid given during my short visit to Atlanta. I planned to see you before I left, but I found this impossible as I was rushed to the Bus Station by Dr. Reddick.

Since I have been up here, I have not been able to make both ends meet at all as my people at home have not answered my request and the way things are going now, it seems that my support may be cut off and thus get me stranded. I have registered at New York University Graduate School of Business Administration and all my classes are in the night, but one. My fees have not be paid waiting till when I hear from home, I am owing my landlord and pity of it all, I am eating on a borrowed money. I am still looking for job that will help me somehow if even I should be fortunate in getting some aid from home or here.

It will be appreciative if you can introduce me to somepeople around here or some organization that I may seek aid from in helping me to realize my life's ambition. If you think that I can get a loan through Mr. Weiseger from the Rotary International, it would be greatly appreciated and as soon as I finish my studies, I will work to pay back the debt.

I am enclosing herewith two of the letters from dad to give you an idea of what is actually happening. The whole thing is all a breach of contract. It came at an unexpected time and when I have not been warned before hand of their intentions. Please return the enclosed letters with your reply.

My best regards to the other members of your family and the staff of the Southern Regional Council.

Awaiting your reply at your earliest convenience,

Yours sincerely,

Dear Dr. Mitchell:

Dr. Johnson told me that you stopped by yesterday. I went to the program at Clark College, and that was the only diversion I have had for the past three weeks. Thanks ever so much for calling.

Life at Morehouse College is always a busy one and I find it difficult to do anything besides studying and working in certain projects on the campus, being a Representative of the Student Council. I hardly get out of this "sheltering sanctuary" at all.

However I am glad to report that I am doing well and I find my classes very interesting. I do like the school and I am learning more by coming here. Not only have I gained new knowledge from solid text-books, but I have come to realise that life is worth every second and there's a lot to do in this "sick" world. The greatest thing about knowledge is that the more one learns, the more there is yet to learn - knowledge is so unconquerable!!

Oh, yes, I did not tell you but Mr. Weisiger has agreed to pay your $50 and that when I go up to work in New York next summer, this shall be refunded to him. It is very nice of him and I am wondering whether you have heard from him.

I do hope you are following very closely the world events. As I sit down here this evening, I am thinking of man's injustice to man; Africa - her peoples and her problems; the world and its problems or maybe its headaches. I wish I knew what the answers are to the many questions I ask myself. These surely are the times that try men's souls.

It makes one fighting mad to read about such gross injustices that are being meted on our people in Africa. I suppose many of the governmental officials are so arrogant and supercilious that they don't even attempt to convince our people that anything is being done to ameliorate conditions. Many people have told deliberate lies about Africa and our people in order to justify their exploitation of our people and our natural wealth. I am not prepared to say what the solution is to such problems as exist in South Africa. I am not a pacifist because I do believe that there are some people who will respect nothing but might. At the same time I wouldn't advocate our people to fight against the overwhelming odds of modern war weapons when they can fight more effectively against oppression by what I would call civil disobedience or more specifically, non-cooperation with the oppressor. I was just thinking about the various ways other oppressed people have won some degree of freedom. Civil disobedience is certainly the weapon.

I'm now thinknig of the conditions and factors that led to the American Revolution - taxation without representation etc. History bears out the fact that the colonists were justified in taking the matters into their own hands.

But many Europeans and Americans have the audacity to preen themselves on being the most civilized people now in existence, and on being such God fearing Christians. I agree that most of them are or can be very civilized but they do some very reproachful things in the name of Christianity.

During the war, Joe Louis said, "we will win the war because we are on God's side." It was well publicized. I wonder how many Europeans can say they have the right to suppress the masses of their African colonies because they (the Europeans) are on God's side. You can take a little bit of blood from a healthy person periodically but you will kill him if you take large amount too often.

I think Olaku is getting on all right in New York and I have heard from him of recent.

Hope you are doing well and keeping fit. Please remember me to Mrs. Mitchell and the girls.

Sincerely,

Victor B. Kotun

AFRICAN STUDENTS' ASSOCIATION

ATLANTA BRANCH

PRESENTS

"OSISIGANYAN"

(DANCE OF THE ELITE)

SATURDAY NIGHT, MAY 9, 1953 - 8:15

DAVAGE AUDITORIUM CLARK COLLEGE

Statement About The Occasion

The African Student's Association of North America, of which our Branch (Atlanta Branch) is but a part, exists on the campuses of American Universities and Colleges where African students who are conscious of their duties and responsibilities, not only to Africa but to the American public, live and study. The Association was not organized for the mere desire of adding to the multiplicity of associations already extant in America. It was rather the crystalization of the thoughts of our predecessors as they racked their brains in search of possible ways of meeting the challenges hurled at them as Africans and as foreign students in a foreign land.

The Association was born with aims. One of such aims, as is emphasized in the preamble of our Branch's Constitution, is "The promotion of better understanding of Africa and the cultivation of friendly relations among other peoples."

It is in pursuit of this vital aim and goal that we of this Association present this "Osisiganyan" tonight in this University Centre to the public of Atlanta. It is our hope and prayer that those of you who have elected to witness this program as well as support our feeble effort will have an inkling of our culture and an idea of what it used to be, is, and is becoming as it simmers in the melting pot of a dynamic world culture. In this program we feature aspects of social life in Nigeria, Liberia, and Sierra Leone.

Foreword

A visitor to Africa will come in contact with a variety of dance styles. Dance customs vary from section to section, but there is a common pattern — the dancers' steps synchronize with the rythms of drums. As one lands at Lagos (Nigeria) and travels into Yorubaland, one is sure to come in contact with "Kete," a dance of twists and turns very popular among the lads and reminiscent of the past. The Yorubas in Western Nigeria are noted for their artistic ingenuity. From them comes the "Kori," a fertility dance. The "Osisiganyan" is also Yoruba but very popular in the Itsekri State. As one enters Eastern Nigeria, one finds among the Ibibios the "Itembe" dance, a kind of ballroom dance with peculiar African "knocks." The "Abang" dance is also peculiar to Ibibio State. The dancers are mainly young girls who hover around during Christmas time, while "the man" makes "wall-flowers" out of them. "Ekong" is a chivalrous dance of the Ibibios reminiscent of the past age. The market scene is just one corner in a "super-market" in the open air. Even in the market music is common. In fact Africa is a land of mirth. The solo drummer is just typical of those who live by drumming as a profession. The "Ashiko" is a kind of ballroom samba common to all areas, but peculiar to Freetown in Sierra Leone. From Liberia comes the "Quadrille," a Western dance Africanized.

In order to appreciate the polyrhythmic African music, close observation is necessary. You can detect the separate elements of gong-gong, drums, rattle and sometimes, hand-claps combine to allure the listening ears.

Dear Victor:

Very many thanks for your heartwarming letter. I appreciate your kind remarks, and return your praises to you; the victory in all these hard matters is yours.

Here's the excellent article back. The best things written these last few weeks about African matters have been by just such youngsters as yourself. They show a notable new quality and determination, that will get their proper rewards.

Dance business was fine; interesting, skillful, and at a sustained pace that had a professional quality. Congratulations to the whole cast.

I had a note from Olaku. Doing all right, though times, I can see, are hard. Will finish at NYU this August, and hopes to do some work at Columbia U. next year.

Come to see me.

Dear Dr. Mitchell,

Let me bend down now and write to you. It has been a busy moment for me throughout. I have been busy with my studies, collecting materials for my term-papers, attending practices for the forthcoming cultural program that I did not have time to eat my meals or get above minimum of sleep. I am now beginning to come alive again. I do hope you are doing fine as well as enjoying the season.

It was nice being at your place the other day.

I heard from Olaku several days ago and I quote: "Tell Dr. Mitchell I want to write him of my success in getting myself through school and not my failure, hence my not writing since. But as soon as my fees are paid, I'll write him immediately to tell him of this good news."

I am sure he is doing O.K. and I hope to see him in Summer.

You already know that the African Students Association is putting up a cultural program on May 9, at Davage Auditorium, Clark College. It promises to be a good performance. You may want to witness it.

I hope you are keeping abreast with world events. I think the world is just crazy. When power accumulates too much, power explodes. I guess a third world war might give "primitive" Africa a release. That is why I am taking it easy! I believe on no theories. All I want is freedom for Africa to manage its own affairs as an independent nation. Imperialism & Communism are useless for Africa. We want Africanism and that is all.

I am taking the fullest advantage of my opportunity to make all the friends ~~that~~ I can for myself, to the end that international relations may be bettered thereby.

I am interested in all peoples of the world and believe that the africans, Asians, Europeans are as good as the Americans. They are primitiveness, ignorance and foolishness that segregate. I have confidence in the youths of the present generation. They can begin where our elders have left (failed) and carry successfully through - regarding all human beings as equal and worthy to be treated as such in the eyes ~~of the~~ of others and the law. I believe in all local leaders of Africa and trust they can set the fire of revolution ablaze some day. I believe in all religions of mankind as long as such religions teach and practice love, unity, co-operation and labor. And I believe in you because I have been inspired by your yeoman sacrifice to humanity and I have myself been made bold to follow your foot-steps by your speeches, fatherly advice and personal life. You have kindled the light that has shown Oleku and I the paths to self-realization, to the upliftment of our common world, and to the service of our fellow man.

In the light of that knowledge of which you have been the source, I now dedicate my life afresh to strive for a better Africa and a better world.

Hope you are well. Thus with best regards to you, Mrs. Mitchell and the girls, I am,

Sincerely yours,
Victor B. Tolkin

Dear Olaku:

Very many thanks for your good letter. I am sure that for all your cheerfulness you have had a hard struggle. I wish I could directly help you. But keep going, and you'll be the stronger man for these experiences. The Columbia decision is fine. Do go there, you will benefit a lot.

The Mitchell family greatly enjoyed the enclosed program; it was done with grace and skill, and at a moving pace that had a professional quality about it. Kotun performed well, so did Akiwowo; Olatunji was great on his drums, and Ekut, I think, was the star.

Let me know how it all goes.

Dear Dr. Mitchell,

I am sure you must have been wondering why you have not heard from me. I have my reason, and this is to keep my word that I will report my progress when I think I have the situation on hand or under control.

First of all, I have to thank you greatly for the suggestions you offered as to the people I should see for assistance when I informed you about my unfortunate circumstance at the beginning of the school year. I got in touch with those people, but nothing worthwhile financially came out; however, the moral suggestions of the people helped.

Briefly, I have been able to see the first semester through, ~~by~~ through the help of some ministers of the Episcopal Church, and what I am making in my work at Saint Luke's Hospital; ~~and~~ during this second semester, I got an aid from the Institute of International Education which actually is helping in seeing me through this semester and possibly the first part of the summer session. All being well, I am planning to finish by October, try to find work with a Bank or an Export House while at the same time studying at Columbia University in Banking and Marketing for the ensuing year.

I hope all is well with the Mitchell's family. My regards to them. Thanks a million for your great help. Hope to see you sometime .

Goodluck,

Sincerely yours,

Dear Friends:

You sent me a questionnaire about Victor Kotun. I know Victor Kotun pretty well, but I guess I don't know him well enough to fit him into the various categories specifically asked about on the form. So let me just tell you what I know.

In Nigeria he was an intimate friend to an exceptionally able young fellow named Olaku, who came over to Morehouse College three or four years ago. Olaku made friends on every hand, studied well, and is doing graduate work now at New York University or Columbia. Lives at 42A York Studios, 611 W. 113th St., in New York. Olaku and Kotun had been companions in some sort of youth movement in Nigeria which put on a demonstration and which, I think, fell under the mild displeasure of the British colonial authorities. What I draw out of that is that the two worked together in emergent Nigerian youth nationalism. And Olaku is smart enough to see that this fellow Kotun, who stood up thus early, at 18 or so, has potentialities for Nigerian leadership later on.

Wherefore, Olaku toiled mightily to get Kotun over here. I lent three or four hundred dollars. The Rotary Educational Fund hereabouts put up some more. We paid his passage, and over he came. Most miraculous of all, one of the professors at Atlanta University undertook to provide Kotun with board and lodging for four years, while the boy made his way, all moneyless, through Morehouse.

Kotun has been here for one college year. Does well in his studies. He and I have had two or three visits together down here in the office and a couple at my home. And I have seen him once or twice where he lives. He is a boy of sincere principles, excellent conduct and character. I must say, he is remarkably silent. On most occasions when I have been with him in mixed company, it has been the dickens to get him to talk. He can write, and he writes smoothly and with punch. I think it is just a case of still water running deep. Olaku was all bubbly with easy friendship. Kotun is as friendly as can be, but it is certainly not superficial.

I really think he is a choice young fellow, and to have him in a seminar group will be a rewarding experience for the rest and for him. He is nice looking and has the nicest of manners and has pride and dignity and sensitiveness. He just isn't babbly.

Sincerely,

George S. Mitchell

RE: Victor Kotun

Dear Friend: INTERNATIONAL STUDENT SEMINARS

The above-named person has applied to the American Friends Service Committee for participation in a Volunteer Service Project. We understand that you are acquainted with the applicant, and we would greatly appreciate having your judgment of this person. For information about the project for which this reference is being completed, we are enclosing a brief description of each of the Volunteer Service Projects.

Also enclosed is a form which may be used either in making your evaluation of the applicant, or as suggestive of the kind of information you might want to include in a letter. Any additional comments you would care to make would also be very helpful.

We call to your attention one factor common to all projects: each is, in a sense, an experiment in group living. One challenge which all share is that of adjusting to living with a group of people, with varying backgrounds of race, nationality, religion, and economic status, as well as assuming cooperatively with these persons, responsibilities for planning and carrying out a number of activities.

It may interest you to know that each applicant suggests four persons as references. Since we rarely have the opportunity in this office to interview project applicants, your evaluations are very important to us.

Your early reply will be appreciated and will enable us to give the applicant an early decision. We would like to be able to acknowledge the receipt of each reference returned to us, but due to the volume of our work, we are unable to do so. Thank you for your cooperation. The Service Committee appreciates your efforts on behalf of the applicant.

Sincerely yours,

Folsen Hunt

Dear Sirs:

I knew Mr. Olaku pretty well during his last two years at Atlanta University--50-51 and 51-52. And I have seen him once or twice since he has gone up to New York.

Okaku was quite outstanding on his college campus, both among his own group of African students and among the student body in general. He has a compellingly engaging personality. Kindness, cooperativeness, sprightliness, etc.; and yet he is serious and thoughtful. Did well in his studies. Has been businesslike and enterprising in finding private employment in New York City. It is really amazing that a young fellow straight from Nigeria could make his way around so well.

I would pick him for any job he thinks he can do. Honest, competent, and a bucker-upper to any group he is with.

Dear Victor:

My few remaining New York friends are not of much use, as Olaku will testify. He made the round of them some months ago. Get him to give you the letter I wrote him then, and go to see any of them you will, and describe your and my friendship. But I am afraid all you will get out of them is what Olaku got: moral encouragement.

I will be this week-end at a conference where a lot of big rich people, some of them from New York, will be, and I will try to find there somebody who might pick you up. If so, I will give the man your address and urge him to do something.

Try my friend Harry Wright. His office is at 271 West 125th Street. Telephone—Monument 6-2083. Home address: 2171 Madison Avenue, Apartment 5-E.

I want to help, but honestly, there isn't much I can do.

Dear Dr. Mitchell:

I am sorry I did not get to see you before leaving Atlanta. Everything was just in a rush.

Finally got here on Monday morning and since then, I have been looking for a job. It has now reached a climax, but still, I'm not giving up hope.

I was supposed to work for Messrs. Weil & Damsky Inc, but when I ~~was~~ visited them on Monday, I was made to understand that they already have a full compliment of their personnel. I cannot work at the Hospital, because they pay $22.00 a week to start with and that is just like working from hand to mouth. In fact that job is meant for medical students. I am not and as such it is useless working there - no matter what experience I might accumulate.

I am still exploring some areas, but I am wondering whether you cannot give me the addresses of some people whom you think I should contact for help in getting a situation.

Olaku is now working at the National City Bank of N.Y. Someone made the contact for him and he started last week.

Please do what you can. I know that it would bear more weight if someone in your position should recommend me to someone.

By the way, did you receive any information from the American Friends Service Committee? The dean suggested that I attend such a seminar in my senior year, and I have abandoned that plan.

I shall be too glad to hear from you at your earliest convenience.

With best wishes & kindest regards,

Sincerely yours,

Mr. Frank S. Loescher
414 S. 46
Philadelphia, Pa.

Dear Frank:

Sorry to call on you for a job so soon after you get back, but I've got a young friend in some distress in Philadelphia, and you could do a good deal to get him into workable channels.

The tale goes back to a Nigerian student at Morehouse College here named Nathaniel Olaku, who graduated a year ago and has been making his way at New York University since. Olaku is a honey. Everybody's friend and full of energy. Olaku told several of us that the one young fellow whom he most wanted to bring over to this country was Victor Kotun. I never got quite the straight of it, but I guessed that Olaku and Kotun, as late teen-agers, together were in some shindig, nationalistic in character, which the British didn't like. Kotun taught for a year in Liberia and came over here June '52 on a Liberian passport. Olaku had worked out a deal for Kotun under which Kotun was to stay in the home of one of the professors at Atlanta University, who undertook to feed and lodge Kotun for four straight years--an amazingly generous offer. Various of us rustled around and scared up Kotun's passage money. Morehouse gave him a scholarship. Kotun and Olaku worked the sommer of '52, and Kotun (and Olaku too) paid off great gobs of his debt for passage money, and so on.

The boy did all right at Morehouse this past year. Grave; mature of thought; genuinely religious, with that special fervor of those reached by able missionaries (a Baptist?); excessively silent conversationally; but full, expressive, and soberly responsible in the written word. He went up to New York this summer for a job and stayed where Olaku stays. Had a hard time getting work, and in mid-summer went down to Philadelphia and worked as a laborer. Hard physical work was probably too much for a thinnish student's body, and he came down with fevers and trouble, but worked on. Got robbed in his wretched lodgings. Still, he paid back a hundred dollars to one of his Atlanta scholarship aiders.

Now he gets word that his professor's home at Morehouse won't be open to him. The professor has picked him a room at Morehouse and told him how much his room will be, etc. The boy writes me today that he isn't going back to Morehouse, but will stay on and fight his way through college in Philadelphia, somehow.

I don't know what the business at Morehouse was about. Trust Kotun to have been honorable and decent.

Will you fetch him up into fresh air and see what ought to be done? He has asked the Rotary Educational Fund here in Atlanta for a $500 loan. May well get it. I will see what I can do about that.

Anyhow, I don't suppose he knows a soul in educated circles in Philadelphia. Thing I want to say is that I know the boy pretty well and have 100% confidence in his competence, character, and purpose.

I and West Africa will thank you for whatever you can do to get him in a course he should follow. Address: 699 North Broad Street, #209.

Ray Steinberg
Fellowship House
1431 Brown St.
Philadelphia, Pa.

Dear Ray:

We just received today a letter from an African student now in Philadelphia, containing a recital of his financial woes. He had been going to Morehouse College here in Atlanta on a scholarship, and went up North to make some money during the summer. He was ill, and he got robbed, and to top it off, the man who was subsidizing him here notified him just the other day that the subsidy was at an end.

Since the boy has saved up no money to live on this fall, he's decided to stay in Philadelphia and try to work and go to school. My boss has put him in touch with Frank Loescher and a few other people who might be able to help, and I wrote him that you all would be nice to him and give him moral support (and probably advice about where to live), anyway. (You all is plural, and refers to all the people at Fellowship House.)

His name is Victor Kotun. Comes from Nigeria. He's serious and extremely shy. Expresses himself well on paper, and made good grades at Morehouse.

If he does drop by to see you, I'll appreciate your making him at home and doing what you can to cheer him up.

I'll be hoping to see you and Lu and all the others in a few weeks.

Sincerely,

Dear Victor:

Sorry you've had so much trouble. I'm sure you have done a man's part. I talked this morning with Frank Loescher in Philadelphia. Home address, 414 South 46. Telephone, Sherwood 7-0277. He says he will go out to your address this afternoon and try to find you and check over with you what is to be done. He is back only ten days or so from nearly a year in South Africa, for one of the foundations. Can give you excellent advice.

Other friends thereabouts: Richard Bennett, American Friends Service Committee, 20 South 12th Street, Philadelphia 7. Telephone, RIttenhouse 6-9372.

Emily Calhoun, Pendle Hill School, Plush Mill Road, Wallingford, Pennsylvania. Arrives September 19. That's out in the suburbs. Telephone, MEdia 6-4507. She's been my secretary for the last two years. Quaker girl. New to Philadelphia, but could put you in touch with helpful people. You remember her, and she remembers you.

William H. Gray, Jr., formerly president of Florida A&M College at Tallahassee, now secretary of the Philadelphia Commission on Human Relations, or whatever it is called. It may be called the Governor's Committeeon Employment, or something of that sort. He is a Negro and my good friend. He would advise you. Might be able to find people to help you.

I will talk to Kendall Weisiger and hope he will come through with a loan. I don't see how you have paid him back in the splendid way you have when you have had so many distresses.

You are quite right that you have a duty to fight on through and get a notable education. There are mountains waiting for you to life when you get back.

Mr. Victor Kotun, Sept. 9, 1953

The best college anywhere around Philadelphia is Swarthmore. Don't know whether you could get in, but if you did get in, you would be very lucky.

At Haverford College, which is no great remove from Philadelphia, the professor of sociology is Ira deA. Reid, who used to work with this Council and was for years professor at Atlanta University. Man of much distinction. Negro. Could help you if he should care to.

If you could find David Billikopf, he could be very helpful. His father was a student of my father's. David's father achieved great financial stature in Philadelphia and led many of the charitable purposes of the city. Has been dead several years. David is wealthy in his own right. I don't know whether he is reachable in Philadelphia or not. May be in South America. I would not speak to others of Billikopf, but if you can locate him and visit him and use my name, you will find him a true friend to have.

If I had any money, I would send you some, but I am literally without any.

If I can at any time do you any favor at Morehouse, I will be glad to. That goes for obtaining a transcript of your record there, rush-rush, or anything of the sort.

Sincerely,

George S. Mitchell

IMPORTANT

699 N. Broad St. #209
Philadelphia 23, Pa.
9/7/53.

Dear Dr. Mitchell,

By now you surely must have given up on me! I could rattle off the usual excuses, but instead I'll just tell you that I honestly have been undergoing a rough summer. I sincerely apologise for my inability to write.

After I got your last letter, I landed a job as a laborer (Road Construction). But as my body could not get adjusted to the conditions of work (you know what that implies - fever, low resistance, headache & fatigue) & had to quit the job.

So I moved here to Phila - to work at Campbell Soup Co, Camden, N.J. Because of hunger and the adjustment I had to make from a College student to a factory laborer, I was very ill, and had to work for 11, 12 even 15 hours nevertheless. Then I was disturbed by the ugliness of my room and the inadequate provisions made for our comfort. If only we have four of us here, we would have made the authority become ~~an~~ more aware of our presence and their own injustice too. However, the season will soon be over.

Fate has been trying it very hard with me this summer. By that, I mean that I was robbed here three weeks ago — all my money — clothes and other valuables. The Police is still investigating the matter. Since then

I have been working very hard to make the two ends of the robe to meet - ~~for~~ besides paying the sum of $150 due Mr. Weisiger, I will still need about $200 ~~for~~ to meet my incidental expenses, books etc. for the ~~path~~ academic year 1953-4. Believe me Sir, I know what heartache means, and that is one of the sad experiences one has to undergo in a foreign land. I am sending 100 dollars to Mr. Weisiger today.

Another sad news that I have for you is that Dr. R. O. Johnson, who agreed to provide meals & lodging for me for the period of 4 years that I'll be at Morehouse College, wrote me yesterday stating that he is no longer in a position to support me. I will not live in his house anymore, he said, and that I have to take care of my boarding & lodging at Morehouse Dormitory. The notice he gave me was too short (just 2 weeks ~~to~~ before the opening of the school).

He has even gone so far ~~to~~ as to make reservation for a room for me to stay on the campus and he quoted the prices that I have to pay. This was too sudden, and I can't understand why.

It was rumored last April that he had told the school authority that he would no longer support me and that I ~~would~~ will not live in his home again. When this came to my knowledge, I did not hesitate to ask him to vouch for the accuracy of the report and rumor.

He denied any knowledge of it, and told me that he has made a promise to Olahn and that he was going to live up to his promise by all means. I took him for his words. Now ~~it~~ time has proved that he had an ulterior motive in mind.

Well, Sir, I cannot return to Atlanta under such conditions. To carry a full schedule of work during the school year to pay for my board & lodging and at the same time carry a full load of studies would be too strenuous on me. Above all, I can't live in that environment, and at Morehouse campus and be happy. Constant rumination over the whole thing will not enable me to get on well. Had he confirmed the rumor last April, I could have made the necessary arrangement possible to enable me to continue my education somewhere else. But now, at the eleventh hour — there is very little I can do. It is too sad a situation to be in.

But come what may, I am prepared to accept the challenge and face the battle with the fortitude of my ancestors. Yes, I will present and future difficulties notwithstanding. I will not return to atlanta but rather will stay up here and work my way thro' school - if even it takes me 6 years to get my first degree. And I hope that by the help of the great arbiter of Human events, I shall defy, successfully, those who refuse to help. It is going to be at a tremendous disadvantage and against almost insuperable odds (if the Immigration does not finally eject me from the country). One needs courage, faith in oneself, determination, and realistic ~~faith~~ hope. Yes, I'll undertake it with sober and realistic calculation of the risks involved, and the fact that others before me have achieved a modicum of success (even without external or internal aid) vindicates the truth that I too can do it.

No, I will not return to Atlanta. I'll not accept Dr. Johnson's take-it-or-leave-it ultimatum. And time and history shall vindicate whether this uncalled for disappointment on the part of Dr. Johnson, can alter the destiny of a virgin youth like me, especially where I am awake and realise that I am born to be and that I am destined to play a constructive and significant role in the social, political & economic advancement of my people.

If ever I have felt the pangs of disappointment in my life, it is now. For Dr. Johnson to turn his back to me at this crucial stage of the battle is a bitter pill for me to swallow, yet I'll have nothing personally against him, other than leaving him and his conscience to God and His unfathomable river of time.

And by the help of the great God, I shall survive the ordeal. I am seeking admission to any of the schools here in Phila. And I ask Mr. Weisiger for a loan of 500 dollars so that I get on fairly well, without scratching from the start. If there is any concrete way you can help, please co-operate.

Pray for me Sir, and I will at all times think of you and your fatherly encouragement and moral support.

Sincerely,
Victor B. Kotun

Dear Mr. Miller:

I am picking up on the relationship with the group of people representing agencies which gathered in the office of the Southern Regional Council on February 22. Miss Harris attended the meeting in my place and has referred to me your letter of March 17 with the proposed statement on "Safety of the Person."

I have only one suggestion to make which is more in the nature of a comment. I gather from your letter and from talking with Miss Harris that there was a real effort on the part of the group to limit the number of specific areas under B in the statement to a few main ones. However it seems that if you are listing as many as four with sub headings under one of them that, the area of employment discrimination ought to be mentioned as an area of tension. If the group wished to list one or two such as housing, and law enforcement then I would think the detailing of other major areas would not be indicated.

I note that the next meeting will be in Birmingham, Alabama, May 15. I am sorry it will not be possible for any of our staff to attend since we will be attending national staff sessions in New York City at that time. However, we will appreciate having a report of the meeting for we should like to keep in touch with the kind of thinking the group is doing.

Best wishes to you and for the meeting in May.

Dear Mrs. Hurley:

Here are the outfits that so far have accepted the invitation to come to the meeting in Birmingham May 15 which you are so kindly arranging: National Student Council of the YWCA, Southern Regional Office; American Friends Service Committee, Dallas, Texas; Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, Atlanta Office; Race Relations Adviser, Federal Housing Administration; Fellowship of Southern Churchmen; National Council of Churches; National Urban League, Atlanta Office; Alabama Division, SRC; Atlanta Office, SRC; Catholic Committee of the South; your own office.

As to how many people that is, we don't really know. I would think a minimum of nineteen, and probably not over twenty-five.

May we count on your office to have someone available who could keep minutes (by no means verbatim)?

We have called the meeting for 9:30 in the morning, hoping people will really get down to business by ten o'clock. I should expect the meeting to last over into the early afternoon. I leave lunchetn your good offices. We could fetch in sandwiches and make out. For that small number of people, I should think it would hardly be needful to call on the church ladies to turn out a trimmed-up luncheon!

Mrs. Tilly is coming over with us, and she is today writing to get word to Mrs. Evins to bring about three people from the Birmingham Council of Church Women.

If you have friends thereabouts who could ~~represent other~~ represent other helpful organizations that you know about, they would, of course, be welcome. I think of such groups as the National Council of Negro Women or some of the local churches, or others.

As to the Press, we have thought that this meeting, like the one February 22, would be an occasion for pretty intimate discussion of long-range objectives, and that some, at least, of the outfits would prefer to have it a private occasion. If any question comes up about coverage, the meeting could decide what its wishes would be.

Dear Friend:

Enclosed is a copy of the statement on housing needs and tensions, agreed upon by representatives of Southern agencies meeting in Birmingham May 15.

Minutes of that meeting will be mailed to you shortly by George Mitchell. Meanwhile, those of you who were able to be present will recall that it was decided as follows:

(a) That those who wished to do so were to present the housing statement to their own agency policy-making bodies, with a view to getting official approval of it.

(b) That all agencies present and invited to be present at the meeting were asked to notify George Mitchell, Southern Regional Council, 63 Auburn Ave., Atlanta, Ga., as convener, of any approving action of their policy-making bodies. If possible, such notification should reach him on or before June 15.

(c) The Southern Regional Council, it was agreed, might print the statement in mid-June, using as explanatory language the following: "Discussed by a gathering at Birmingham May 15, 1952, of persons from agencies concerned with human relations in the South. Most of those present agreed to bring this statement to the attention of the policy-making bodies of their agencies. The statement has so far been approved by...," the dots representing the agencies which may have notified George Mitchell by mid-June of official approving action.

(d) The matter of publicity for the statement was put into the hands of a committee composed of Harold Fleming, Alex Miller, and Harry Alston.

I sincerely hope that your agency will find it possible to subscribe to the statement. And, in any case, you are cordially invited to make free use of it within your own agency or with others, following its public release in mid-June.

Dear Mr. Mitchell:

I was pleased to join you in the panel discussion recently in New York during the meeting sponsored by the National Committee Against Discrimination in Housing.

The document prepared by Southern Regional Conference conferees at the Birmingham meeting May 15th, of persons from agencies concerned with human relations in the South has been read by me and other officials of this Association, with much interest.

As President of the Texas Council of Negro Organizations, representing some 43 statewide bodies, I wish to concur in the sentiments contained and the views expressed in the document. While time will not permit me to submit this document to each organization, I am certain that I speak the sentiments of the member bodies of the Texas Council of Negro Organizations.

Sincerely,

A. Maceo Smith

Dear Sir:

Thank you very much for sending Fellowship House of Knoxville a copy of the Birmingham statement for our endorsement.

When our group was chartered two years ago we declared ourselves to be a non-action organization. The Board of Fellowship House has always interpreted this quite narrowly to include non-endorsement of any sort. We are a small and wholly volunteer group, and guard against our enthusiasm sweeping us past our chosen job, which is doing what we can here locally, at short range.

I should personnally like to commend the meeting for the presentation which you sent us. It is particularly valuable in presenting steps that can be taken.

Sincerely,

Mrs. W. J. Moulder

SOUTHERN REGIONAL COUNCIL

63 AUBURN AVENUE, NE

ATLANTA 3, GEORGIA

June 3, 1952

Dear Mr. Smith:

The Executive Committee of the Southern Regional Council met May 30. They approved the statement presented at the May 15 Birmingham meeting, called BLIGHTED HOUSING AND BOMB VIOLENCE, as a statement of SRC policy.

In the Committee's close analysis of the statement, they suggested four minute changes in wording, as follows:

Page 2, line 13, delete "inevitable." Line 27, delete "annual." Line 28, for "per year" substitute "each year."

Page 3, numbered paragraph 7, instead of "press for," "explore."

The Southern Regional Council proposes to print the statement in the issue of NEW SOUTH coming out about June 15, and unless we hear from you or others to the contrary, we will print it with these slight changes. We feel the more assured of consent, as none of them seem to affect the sense of the statement.

Sincerely,

George S. Mitchell

Dear Doctor:

I should like to go on record in the name of our Committee approving the statement on housing needs and tensions that was agreed upon by Southern Agencies in Birmingham on May 15th.

I would like very much to give this statement wide publicity throughout the Church in the South. If it is possible I will try to purchase enough copies of your June issue of the "New South". If not, if it is agreeable with others and yourself, I will mimeograph the statement and enclose it with our Newsletter.

Race Issue Enters Campaign

Campaign literature involving the race issue was circulated by Umstead supporters throughout Eastern North Carolina yesterday.

A handbill showed a photograph of Hubert E. Olive and his Buncombe County campaign committee and one of the men in thephotograph was identified as a Negro. The handbill said the picture appeared in the Asheville Citizen-Times on May 4.

The Asheville Citizen-Times told the News & Observer it carried the photograph, but never identified either of the men as Negro as the handbill implied.

The handbill also carried statements with the implication that they appeared in the Citizen-Times, but this was denied by the newspaper.

The handbill declared:

"Kerr Scott, who seeks the Negro vote for his hand-picked choice for Governor, has appointed Negroes to the State Board of Education and other commissions. Hubert Olive has promised the Negroes he will continue Scott's program.

FIRST OFFICIAL ACT

"Hubert Olive has declared his first official act, if elected, will be to fire the Commissioner, of Paroles, and his Negro leaders are passing the word along that his Negro manager will be named paroles officer as a pay-off to the Negro block voters.

"Is this kow-towing to the Negro vote merely a desperate effort by Candidate Olive or is it a deliberate attempt to end segregation? Before you vote May 31, ask yourself two questions:

"Do you want a Negro paroles commissioner?

"Do you want your children to go to school with Negroes?"

The handbill was signed "Worth Hinton - Four County Committee for Umstead."

But an effort to locate Hinton was futile.

SRC - Staff Memos

MEMO TO HAROLD FLEMENING June 6, 1952

Nelson Jackson called this morning, in re Birmingham statement. He, Jackson, authorizes SRC in carrying the statement in the June NEW SOUTH to include notation that the statement has been approved by the Southern Field Division of the National Urban League. He says that actual physical clearance of the statement through his New York office would probably be so slow as to make it impossible to include mention in the June NEW SOUTH. But he feels that the N. Y. office will have no bojection, and he will take on himself the authority thus to approve it. It so happens that the statement in some ways closely parallels one issued by the Nat'l. Urban League in N. Y. on January 17, 1952, expressing the view of the National Urban League on the murder of the Moores in Fla.

By my records then, we have had approval by: SRC (subject to Leonard Haas), CCS (letter attached), Texas Council of Negro Organizations (letter attached), ADL.

We have a letter from Mrs. Moulder at the Fellowship House in Knoxville, saying they are sorry they are not so set up as to make it possible for them to endorse. Letter attached.

Dear George:

I have your letter of June 4th, together with its enclosures, which I have read with a great deal of interest.

While I approve without qualification the statement on "Blighted Housing and Bomb Violence", I doubt the propriety of putting it out as a statement of SRC policy in its present form.

I am afraid that in its disapproval of certain government policies and programs, and its approval of others, together with its urging the enactment of certain municipal ordinances, the Council is getting into the field of political propaganda, which is prohibited, if we are to retain our tax exempt status.

I suggest that the statement be carefully rewritten, eliminating the objectionable parts.

Sincerely yours,

Leonard Haas

Dear Father Shean:

Warm thanks for your letter of June 3, giving approval on behalf of the Catholic Committee of the South to the Birmingham statement.

Thus far, approvals have come in from you, from the Texas Council of Negro Organizations (some 29 different groups there), the Anti-Defamation League, and the Southern Field Office of the National Urban League. SRC's Executive Committee endorsed it on behalf of the Council May 30 (though there is still a formal matter of approval by our counsel, which I don't doubt will be forthcoming). We expect the NAACP to endorse it also, and maybe some of the others.

The issue of NEW SOUTH containing it should be in print by June 20. We will have an extra thousand printed. I could send you as large a chunk as you might want out of that thousand, at costs. Ordinarily, that is about five cents apiece.

I know you rejoice to have Phil Ogilvie and his bride there with you. My regards to them.

Dear George:

I have just received a letter from Mrs. Edward W. Macy, President of the Young Women's Christian Association of the U.S.A. in response to my inquiry as to whether the National Board could lend its name to the statement on Blighted Homes and Bomb Violence. Mrs. Macy said that the Executive Committee gave careful consideration to the inquiry and expressed great appreciation for the manner in which the group was dealing with so serious a problem. However, it has been the policy of the National Board not to sign statements phrased in terms of a particular region. They recognized, she said, the added strength within a statement when it says, as this one does: "As Southerners, we are particularly disturbed by the grave aspects of this problem in our region."

Mrs. Macy stated further that the section headed "Things to Do" "is so in line with our own interracial charter adopted by the National Convention in 1946 and with our National Public Affairs Program that the Executive Committee expressed the hope that these recommendations might be used in the YWCA Magazine and Bulletin to give added stimulus to the efforts of YWCA's all over the country as they work for better race relations." She closed her letter to me with the following statement: "In telling Mr. Mitchell that the National Board cannot sign the statement, please assure him of our admiration whenever a group of responsible citizens shows constructive leadership in this vital area, as has been demonstrated by this group of which he is chairman."

I am leaving today on my vacation and will be back in August. I am counting on your office keeping me informed of any future meetings of this group and any further developments in this area.

Best wishes to you.

Sincerely,

TO: Agencies Signing Statement Adopted in Birmingham, May 15, 1952

FROM: Alex Miller, Harry Alston, and Harold Fleming

You will recall that we were named a committee of three to arrange publicity for our joint statement "Blighted Housing and Bomb Violence." Attached are copies of the news release and the full text of the statement as printed in NEW SOUTH. Please note that the release date is Sunday, July 20.

We plan to release the statement through the Atlanta bureaus of the three wire services—AP, UP, and INS; the Southern Correspondents of the New York Times, the New York Herald Tribune, and the Christian Science Monitor; the Associated Negro Press; and the Atlanta office of Time.

Any additional publicity that may be arranged by the individual agencies will be most welcome—especially since we will be competing with the Party Conventions for newspaper space.

BLIGHTED HOUSING BREEDS VIOLENCE,
SAY SOUTHERN HUMAN RELATIONS AGENCIES

/See full text of statement attached./

Six organizations active in the South declared today that blighted housing is costing the region a "fearful price" in "distrust, fear, rumor, and ultimately open violence."

The assertion was made in a statement issued jointly by the Southern Office of the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, the Catholic Committee of the South, the Southeast Regional Office of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the Southern Field Office of the National Urban League, the Southern Regional Council, and the Texas Council of Negro Organizations.

The statement, made public in New South, marked the first instance of such cooperation by human relations agencies in the South.

"Since January 1, 1951," it said, "more than 40 bombings have been perpetrated in the South by terrorists and vandals, and many more have been attempted." Most of these, it added, have grown out of racial and religious tensions centering about housing.

Citing the 1950 Census, the statement pointed out that over three-fourths of the American cities with the worst housing are in the South, and nearly three-fourths of this slum housing is occupied by Negroes.

"More often than not," it continued,"real estate interests and fearful white home owners have joined forces to bar the development of suburban expansion areas for Negroes. Thus, hemmed in on one hand by burgeoning business districts and on the other by older white neighborhoods, Negroes have had no choice but to seek a block-by-block conversion of the older housing from white to Negro occupancy. It is this desperate transition process which breeds conflict."

The statement recommended that Southerners seek better police handling of housing tensions, truly representative planning bodies, new expansion areas for those inadequately housed, and more adequate provisions for slum clearance and public housing.

THIRD MEETING OF AGENCIES CONCERNED WITH HUMAN RELATIONS IN THE SOUTH

NASHVILLE, FISK CAMPUS, MONDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 10:00 A. M.

Mr. Herman Long, of the Race Relations Division of the American Missionary Association, is host to this meeting. Place: International Student Center, Fisk University, 10:00 a. m. to 3:00 p. m., November 17.

The meeting at Birmingham May 15, 1952, agreed that the group would meet again in the early part of October, 1952. All agencies were requested to send during the summer reports on the use of racial and religious prejudice in political campaigns to Herman Long, who would, in preparing for the fall meeting, make a digest and proposals. The agencies are cautioned to send in to Herman Long not merely clippings, but in addition, explanatory memoranda.

Some material of this kind has been collected by Mr. Long, and the meeting November 17 will center on the problem of racial and religious prejudice in political campaigns.

Attached is a list of agencies invited to send representatives to the Nashville meeting.

All who were present at the Birmingham meeting found it a worthwhile gathering.

As before, unfortunately, no money to pay expenses. Please notify the writer as to whether you can have a representative present.

Battle of Filibuster: New Round Opens

Foes of unlimited Senate debate center their attack on Rule XXII, which preserves cloture.

By ROBERT BENDINER

TUCKED away in the platform adopted by the Democratic party in July was a modest little plank urging action to protect the harried majority of the United States Senate from domination by the minority. The proposition was not stated quite so baldly, of course, but that was the sense of the plea to "improve Congressional procedure so that majority rule prevails and decisions can be made after reasonable debate. * * *"

What the plank's sponsors had in mind was the simple fact that under Senate Rule XXII the will of the majority does not prevail, since a two-thirds vote is required to force an end to debate to bring a legislative issue to the point of decision. Indeed, thirty-three members can prevent even discussion, let alone passage, of a bill favored by their sixty-three colleagues. All the minority has to do is talk about anything from cabbages to kings —or even read gobs of Byron's "Childe Harold," as a whimsical Senator once threatened to do—until the rest of the chamber, eager to get on with other business or wearied to desperation, at last bows to the will of the few.

As long as the Senate indulges this parliamentary device, suggestively named after West Indian pirates known as filibusteros, it is futile to argue the merits of President Truman's civil rights program. Its proponents are well aware of that, and plans are now taking shape for another assault on the filibuster as soon as the Vice President's gavel falls on Jan. 3.

THEY are roundabout plans, with a unique twist, and they have to be. For while Rule XXII now provides that two-thirds of the Senate may invoke cloture—that is, force an end to debate—on all motions and measures, there is one exception even to this difficult procedure. No limit whatever may be imposed on debating a move to ease the procedure itself by changing the rules.

As Vice President Barkley explains, "the Senate can never reach a point where it can vote on an amendment to its own rules if there is a determined effort made to prevent the Senate from ever reaching that point." A single Senator can check an effort to rid the chamber of the filibuster if his lungs and legs hold out. And there are many more than one who have a stake in preserving it.

Confronted with this certainty that any normal move to make cloture easier would itself be filibustered to death, some of the civil-rights Senators have worked out an unusual, though not completely original, approach. One of their number, very likely Senator Herbert H. Lehman of New York, will rise almost as soon as the chamber is convened and move adoption of all the rules that governed the Senate of the preceding Congress except Rule XXII. For this he would substitute a rule calling for cloture after two days if two-thirds of the members present are so minded or after fifteen days by a simple majority vote.

THERE is nothing startling in the nature of this substitute, but the form of the motion might well revolutionize the procedures of the Senate. For the very move to re-adopt the old rules challenges the hitherto accepted idea that the Senate is a continuing body with a permanent set of regulations. Should Lehman and his colleagues be upheld in reversing this view, then clearly no one Senate can bind its successors, and the method that has been laid down for changing the rules becomes a dead letter.

Some advocates of this scheme, which was proposed at hearings before the Committee on Rules last fall by Walter Reuther, president of the United Automobile Workers, believe that the move itself could not be filibustered. The theory is that the motion would immediately be challenged on a point of order, whereupon Vice President Barkley, whose term runs to Jan. 20, would have to make an immediate decision.

He might rule the motion out of order on the ground that the Senate is a continuing body, with permanent rules, or he might rule it a valid motion, with the inference that each Senate has to make its own regulations. Either way there would certainly be an appeal from the chair, but on such appeals, the theory goes, debate is limited and a decision is reached by a simple majority vote.

SHOULD this plan of attack be carried out, as it is all but sure to be, you will hear a great deal of solemn discussion as to whether the Senate is a continuing body. Senator John J. Sparkman, the Democrats' Vice Presidential nominee, has already commented that never before had it ever occurred to him that the Senate could be regarded in any other way. This view is expected to be shared not only by all the Southerners but by many Northern Senators as well, on the basis of these arguments:

(1) The Senate has a continuing personnel, with only one-third of the seats vacated at the expiration of each Congressional term.

(2) Precedent is all on their side, since the rules adopted by the very first Senate have automatically continued in force until amended or abolished.

(3) Jefferson's Manual of Parliamentary Practice, used since its author's Vice Presidency as a guide to procedure, specifically refers to the Senate as a "continuing body" in contrast to the House of Representatives, all of whose members serve only for a single Congressional term.

AGAINST these arguments Senator Lehman and his colleagues will echo the reasoning advanced by Senator Tom Walsh of Montana, who eloquently but unsuccessfully tried this same gambit back in 1917. They will argue:

(1) Since all bills, treaties and nominations that are pending in the Senate die at the end of the Congressional term, why not the rules of the Senate?

(2) If the Senate is a continuing body, why does it have to reappoint its secretary, sergeant-at-arms and other staff officers at the beginning of each term?

(3) Jefferson's Manual is not part of the Senate's rules, but merely a guide. (If its injunctions were binding, how would the filibusterers get around the provision that "no one is to speak impertinently, or beside the question, superfluously or tediously"? Applying the Manual on this point could close down the Senate.)

(4) The idea of a continuing Senate "is at war with the theory of parliamentary government the world over." Even the British House of Lords, on reassembling after a dissolution of Parliament, goes through all the formalities of reorganization, with every member again taking the oath.

BESIDES these arguments, enemies of the filibuster plan to raise the question of the constitutionality of Rule XXII, which, in Barkley's words, allows the Senate to "freeze its own rules in perpetuity." True, the Senate's rules are for the Senate to determine.

"If there is any one thing that is clear under the Constitution," Senator Richard B. Russell advised the Rules Committee, "it is that any rule a majority of the Senate sees fit to adopt is beyond the purview of any court or executive."

But the point raised by men like Lehman and Senator Hubert H. Humphrey of Minnesota is that it would now require more than a majority of the Eighty-third Senate to undo a rule wished upon it by the Eighty-first; that Senators who had no part in making that rule are forced, in effect, to accept it.

Both sides will doubtless present able briefs, and it is probable that a number of those who favor the civil rights program will be cool to the Lehman thesis and regret that an extraneous issue has been introduced. But the hard probability, if not downright certainty, remains that no civil rights program will be enacted while the threat of the filibuster remains, and no effort to remove the filibuster can succeed while Rule XXII stays intact.

The rule as it now stands grew out of the fight over the civil rights program in 1949, when the battle was at its hottest, but the question of unlimited debate is as old as the Senate itself, though it is rarely argued apart from the tactical purpose it may serve at the moment. As early as the First Congress, Senator Maclay confided to his diary that "the confidence of the people was departing from us, owing to our unreasonable delays."

Divorced, so far as such a thing is possible, from the political causes to which it has been linked from time to time, the principal historic arguments for and against unlimited debate boil down to these:

Senators Holland of Florida and Long of Louisiana confer before taking floor in behalf of Rule XXII in 1949 filibuster battle.

FOR: Unlimited debate assures the power of a minority to resist the tyranny of a passing majority and to protect the rights of the people —"one of the greatest weapons against wrong and oppression," to quote the late Senator George W. Norris, "the members of this body possess."

AGAINST: The majority holds its status at the will of the people and can be deprived of it at a succeeding election. In the meantime, reliance may be placed on the courts to protect the people against inroads on the Constitution. Experience abroad and in the State Legislatures, moreover, has not shown limitation on debate to be a threat to democracy. The House of Commons has had a cloture rule since 1882 and our own House of Representatives has had a limit on debate since its creation in 1789.

FOR: "This is not a country of majority rule," as Senator James A. Reed once said. "The Constitution of the United States was written, in large part, to prevent majority rule. The Declaration of Independence was an announcement that there are limitations upon majority rule." This is a view shared by former Senator Millard Tydings of Maryland. "Majority to hades," was the way he put it.

AGAINST: Majority rule, take it or leave it, is in fact one of the principal assumptions of the American political system. What else is government "by the people"? Where the Declaration calls for minority rights, they are the rights of the individual citizen, not of legislative minorities. Where the Constitution provides exceptions to majority rule in Congress, it specifically states those exceptions and prescribes a two-thirds vote.

FOR: No important legislation defeated by filibustering has been subsequently reenacted, proving that the judgment of the minority was well-founded. The filibuster has killed more bad bills than good ones.

AGAINST: Even if this were accurate, it might only prove, as in the case of civil rights legislation, that the filibustering has been more persistent than beneficent. But many bills once killed by the filibuster have in fact been revived and passed by succeeding Congresses, among them the admission of Arizona and New Mexico to statehood and the bill to arm our merchant ships prior to our entry into World War I.

FOR: The Senate serves as a valuable and sober check on the sometimes impetuous House of Representatives.

AGAINST: The Senate would not be propelled into rash action by a reasonable cloture rule. As a practical political matter, cloture would not be invoked until the body had already had an opportunity for full debate, but the Lehman resolution offers specific guarantees. In addition to the two weeks provided before the majority could close off debate, it would allow an additional hour for each member desiring to speak even after cloture had been voted.

FOR: The Senate is "the last great deliberative body in the world." It should continue to enjoy that prestige. The elder Senator Robert A. La Follette called it "the only place in our system where, no matter what may be the organized power behind any measure to rush its consideration and to compel its adoption, there is a chance to be heard."

AGAINST: There would be ample opportunity to be heard, as already described, under most of the cloture provisions that have been proposed. What threatens the prestige of the "greatest deliberative body in the world" is not a liberal form of cloture but the abuse of free debate that brings the Senate into disrepute: a Huey Long holding up the work of the chamber for fifteen hours while he recites recipes for corn pone, or extended readings by Senators from Aesop's Fables, various encyclopedias, and the World Almanac—at a cost to the taxpayer of $15,000 a day, not counting the $82 a page that The Congressional Record comes to.

"THE Senate of the United States is the only legislative body in the world," said Woodrow Wilson, "which cannot act when the majority is ready for action." Men of the highest integrity, and from all sections of the country, have defended the principle of unlimited debate and will no doubt do so eloquently and extensively again before it is abandoned. But with the fierce pressures of a swiftly changing world now beating down on Washington, it is unlikely that the Senate will indefinitely accept the recurring hazard of self-paralysis.

Given guarantees against any real threat to genuine deliberation, it must eventually come around to the considered view of one of its distinguished members of the past. "To vote without debating is perilous," said Henry Cabot Lodge Sr. some sixty years ago, "but to debate and never vote is imbecile."

SOUTHERN REGIONAL COUNCIL

SPONSORED

MEETING OF REPRESENTATIVES OF SOUTHERN ORGANIZATIONS

AND OF

REGIONAL OFFICES OF NATIONAL ORGANIZATIONS

TO DISCUSS

CURRENT SOCIAL PROBLEMS IN THE SOUTH

AND

COOPERATIVE ACTION ON THEM

MINUTES

The Meeting was called to order at 10:15 A.M. by Dr. George Mitchell, Executive Director of the Southern Regional Council.

Dr. Mitchell: (Report on Political Campaign in Georgia)

Racial and religious prejudice was used late in the campaign. The Talmadge Machine attempted to use it extensively. Church groups came into action pointing out the moral and social evil in the Governor's tactics. The Governor loss his point by at least 30,000 votes despite the use of handbills, etc.

Mr. John Long (Miss., S.R.C.):

Mississippi campaign was better than usual. The proposed Amendment for a Literacy Clause prerequisite to voting was not carried. Negroes are still largely disenfranchised. Probably less than 6,000 Negroes voted in recent elections.

Dr. Herman Long (Fisk):

There were no pronounced appeals to bigotry in Tennessee election campaigns. Negro vote seemed to be split. Communism was the largest campaign issue. Negroes are on the Nashville City Council, but are in opposite camps. There was a good Negro vote except for the Western part of the State. The well remembered lynching in Brownsville, in 1940, deters Negroes from registering.

Mr. Hayes (Urban League, Memphis):

Memphis Negro registration only 20,000 to 80,000 whites. A Negro, Dr. Walker, ran for School Board. Mr. Orville, socially prominent white leader, supported Dr. Walker. Ballot used technique of portraying Dr. Walker blacker than he actually is and placed between two white women. Walker was defeated by close to 8,000 votes (about 1/5 white votes). Some white women helped Walker's campaign. School Board elections are city-wide.

Mrs. Hortense Young (Kentucky):

Kentucky experienced little appeal to bigotry except in the Negro Press. An anti-Nixon pamphlet made an issue of his having signed a restrictive covenent.

Dr. Mitchell:

Kentucky has gone further than any other State here represented in de-segregation. It is strange that bigotry should manifest itself somewhat there.

Mrs. Young:

22,000 Negroes registered in Louisville. About 47,000 registered in Kentucky. Day Law Amendments have encouraged in Kentucky.

Rev. Mr. Thrasher (Ala., S.R.C.):

There was little appeal to bigotry except among the lunatic fringe. Sparkman was attacked as being pro-Negro.

Dr. Mitchell:

Interesting to note that Sparkman was used to frighten Negroes elsewhere in the United States and to frighten whites in his home State.

Mr. Ogilvie (C.C.S.):

South Carolina campaign appealed to prejudice through a proposed amendment to let the State Legislature relinquish its obligation to provide for public education. The Amendment was carried. Meanwhile, Mr. Byrnes came out strongly for Ike, and used New Deal Supreme Court as a threat to prohibit segregation in the South. Stevenson carried South Carolina by a small margin. Byrnes quoted Negroes who were for the continuance of the pattern of segregation.

Louisiana Republicans have Dixiecrat leanings. They are not progressive so far as could be seen last Spring.

Mrs. Wilcox (Methodist Church Women, Tenn.):

There were no appeals to bigotry in her immediate vicinity.

Dr. Long:

Let's discuss what organizations have done to do away with appeals to racial and religious prejudice.

Mrs. Young:

There is much concern in law schools about Supreme Court decisions on segregation.

Mr. L (Fisk):

We must discuss the elimination of balloting restrictions. (Carried out his thoughts at length.)

Mr. Hayes:

Negroes are now about 1/3 of the voters in Shelby County, Tennessee. The figures I gave before were prior to Spring Primaries.

Rev. Mr. Thrasher:

There is a questionaire now in use in Alabama which could be restrictive. Loyalty questions regarding willingness to serve in Armed Forces, etc.

Mr. L

We should study this business of restrictive questionaires. Loyalty oaths are a new twist.

Dr. Mitchell:

We would actively oppose any restrictions on franchise.

Alex Miller (A.D.L.):

What we need now is to differentiate between overt types of prejudice and bigotry and the more subtle implications of those trying to preserve the status quo. Candidates either have tried to out white supremacy each other or have weakly apologized for their position. This time in Georgia groups cooperated in opposing any and all appeals to religious or racial prejudice, and it had a decided effect on campaigners. The Governor came to the point of reading letters from Negro and Jewish citizens, but the Citizens Committee Against the County Unit System, working on a small budget and without salaries, swung the deal against the Administration Amednment.

Mr. (Miami):

Pressure of the vote makes politicians step forward courageously to speak up and sign documents.

Dr. Mitchell:

South Carolina has a large rural Negro vote. We need to work that out in the other States. The Progressive Voters League went out and got voters in South Carolina.

Mr. L

There is Draft Board prejudice in Brownsville. Only 4 whites to 51 Negroes are called. Police and State Troopers are vicious. A prominent banker holds county control.

Dr. Mitchell: The decisive factor in the Georgia situation was the church groups.

Mrs. Wilcox: Was church interest and action spontaneous?

Dr. Mitchell: Yes, somewhat. No, somewhat. The secret is to organize all forces of good in the community and state.

Mrs. T (Tenn.): We cannot get an all inclusive, sure-fire program. We have the urban problem, the rural problem, etc.

Dr. Mitchell: Couldn't we try to get this discussed in both lay and clerical groups throughout the region? Work the ground among the churches so as to have strings to pull, educated people to go back to, etc.

Rev. Mr. Thrasher: Strong state-wide support could be gotten through churches towards the disapplication of prejudice.

Dr. H. Long: Could this business be presented profitably to Senate Committees on Ethics? Could we get State Conventions of Political Parties to make resolutions against appeals to prejudice?

Mr. Miller: Let's set up a central depository for statements against appeals to prejudice.

Mrs. Young: We should explore use of resources in communications media.

Dr. Mitchell: How can we reach religious groups?

Rev. Mr. Thrasher: A resolution ought to be entered by the Department of Christian Social Relations into the Convention in my church.

Dr. Mitchell: The Baptists are autonomous, but if they can be got to, action should come. There is a problems, too, in churches being broken down by race. Negro members should approach their opposite numbers in white churches for a stand against the use of prejudice. Pressure could be put. Could we conclude that we ought to get appropriate action by sending through tie-ups on some issue between white and Negro denominations?

Mrs. T : Needs proper timing.

Dr. H. Long: Why couldn't the Federal Council of Churches call together groups in the region and get thing started? (This suggestion to get attention in Atlanta Office).

Dr. Mitchell: We ought to reach civic organizations, too.

Mrs. Wilcox: Couldn't we get a representative in each city?

Mr. Miller: Who will be the central spark plug? Can S.R.C. take this thing under its wing?

Dr. Mitchell: Yes, it can. Right now, though. let's draw a statemtn and use the technique employed in our Birmingham Meeting, last May.

Rev. Mr. Thrasher: This should be brought to the attention of all local S.R.C. groups.

Dr. Mitchell: We must use existing organizations. We must not creat new ones.

Mr. (Miami): What happened in Birmingham?

(Dr. Mitchell and Mr. Miller gave an explanation.)

Mr. Sweet (Fisk): Might we not go back and assess what has been done by churches through statements and pronouncements?

Mrs. T : People have come futher rationally and emotionally. The issue is often economic. Some people had rather not work through churches.

Dr. H. Long:(Report on materials he had repaired.)

Mrs. T : The churches are slower than other institutions and organizations.

Mrs. Young: Civic groups don't go to respectable Negro eating places when they meet. They could. Why?

Dr. Mitchell: Time is running out. Lunch time comes. I appoint a Committee of Alex Miller, Rev. Mr. Thrasher, Dr. H. Long, Mrs. , and Phil Ogilvie to draw up a statement similar to what we did in Birmingham.

Mr. (Miami): Let's get back to State Conventions.

Dr. Mitchell: I'd like to, but it's impractical. Just do all that you can.

LUNCH

Discussion was held on effects of Supreme Court decisions in regard to segregation in the public schools. Considerable interest was manifested.

Rev. Mr. Thrasher: I move that we, in view of the interest already displayed in the effect of the Supreme Court decision in regard to segregation in public schools, be concerned at our next meeting in January or February, with the subject of the elimination of such segregation, and at Dr. Mitchell's suggestion I accept an amendment that a small committee be empowered to draft the call to this meeting.

Dr. Mitchell here appointed himself, Alex Miller and Herman Long to serve on the Committee.

Meeting was adjourned at 3:15 P.M.

Respectfully submitted,

STATEMENT

We, the undersigned, have been gratified to note a trend away from appeals to racial and religious bigotry in recent political campaigns in the South, and we have noticed that this trend is largely attributable to effective action taken by numerous interested organizations aware of the implications of appeals to such prejudices in political campaigning. We wish, therefore, to recommend to, to encourage and to join with all interested groups in the South in the adoption of appropriate statements of principle opposing the use of appeals to racial and religious bigotry in future political campaigning.

We request that publicity be given, where appropriate, to such statements of principle, and that all available communications media be used in such publicity. We would remind, and have all interested organizations and groups remind, all local, state and national party organizations and candidates for political office that this position has been taken and made public.

We would suggest, too, that all public media of communication be respectful of their public trust and refuse any and all political advertisements appealing to bigotry.

Dear Friend:

You will be pleased to know that the New York Times intends shortly to do a story on the problem of housing tensions with particular reference to the southern scene.

It is expected that one of the important sources for this story will be the statement "Blighted Housing and Bomb Violence" which your organization signed last year.

ATLANTA 3, GEORGIA

December 5, 1952

Here are minutes of the Nashville meeting (November 17, 1952) of agencies concerned with human relations in the South.

The meeting amounted to this: There are a good many signs in the South that the region begins now to desert the old customary use of racial and religious prejudice in campaigns. Partly, this is to be attributed to the increased number of Negro citizens who vote. One of the best measures for lessening such appeals to prejudice will be the further growth of unrestricted use of the franchise. Meanwhile, it has been proven helpful to have in the record of various lay and religious organizations resolutions passed by those bodies condemning the use of racial and religious prejudice in political campaigns. The time to get such resolutions is when political campaigns are not immediately upon us. Then if the prejudice line is played, organizations which have months or years before taken official action against such efforts will the more readily bestir themselves to oppose the use of prejudice in politics.

The organizations represented at the meeting thought it would be possible to get a wave of such resolutions throughout the South. Devices:

1. Action by the central organizations of denominational and lay groups.

2. Persistent follow-up action by local representatives of the various human relations organizations at work in the South.

3. Copies of resolutions to this effect passed by central or local organizations should be sent to Herman Long, Race Relations Institute, Fisk University, Nashville, Tennessee.

Toward this, the Nashville meeting worked out the attached statement, which it recommends to the policy forming boards of the various organizations for their adoption and implementation. What implementation means is really that they ought themselves, and throughout their local units, to pass their own resolutions against the use of racial and religious prejudice in political campaigns.

The meeting thought this a workable program, though it is difficult to carry through without more funds and tighter organization than any of us have. However, you are all urged to do the best you can. And clearly, the passage of hundreds of such resolutions would do a lot to improve the climate of Southern politics.

So please get your group to work.

Sincerely,

George S. Mitchell
Executive Director

P. S. The Southern Regional Council would like to have word of adoption of the policy statement by any of the organizations at or invited to the Nashville meeting, or by other organizations.

Dear Mrs. Hurley:

Try to dig back into your files to the material on the meeting in Nashville November 17, 1952.

Again those present drew up a statement which we hoped would be formally approved as policy by many of the various organizations present or invited.

So far, those approving are SRC, ADL, AJC, and CCS. We will greatly like to add the Southeast Regional Office of the NAACP.

Does it have approval?

I doubt that the statement will be published by any of the organizations. Its recommendation calls for action by many groups, but printing the statement would hardly do good. Though it would be an excellent thing to circulate within all organizations. And that should be done.

Sincerely,

Dear Buck:

When the group met at Nashville November 17, 1952, they drew up a statement which was sent to you a short while after the meeting. Written out on pages 3 and 4 of the enclosed additional copy of the minutes. The idea was that various organizations would adopt the statement as conforming to their own policy; and then each organization would get busy to get its local groups and their friends to act according to the statement and pass resolutions against the use of racial and political prejudice in political campaigns.

The organizations which have adopted the statement are SRC, AJC, ADL, and CCS.

May we add the Fellowship of Southern Churchmen?

I think no one has any plans for publishing the statement. It would hardly help to publish it. But it ought to be approved by the organizations and circulated within them.

Dear George:

You may list the Southeast Area Office, American Jewish Committee, as a signatory of the policy statement regarding the use of bigotry in political campaigns. The statement is in conformity with our national policy and so I have no hesitancy in endorsing it. In the near future, I hope to have our chapters in Miami, Atlanta and Birmingham pass and publicize similar resolutions. I will also bring it to the attention of other groups in Dade County when this is possible.

I have a sizeable quantity of the enclosed pamphlet "The People Take The Lead" in my office. It is a good one, and ought to get into the hands of organizational leaders. I thought that the various member organizations of the Southern Regional Council might be interested in this pamphlet.

Would you consider it appropriate for you to send a copy to the groups on your mailing list? This could also serve as an opportunity to announce my appointment, the opening of our Southeast Area Office, and its availability as a resource agency in the South. Should the recipients of the pamphlet desire additional copies, a limited quantity are available from my office.

Best wishes for the holiday season.

STATEMENT ADOPTED BY NASHVILLE MEETING OF AGENCIES CONCERNED WITH HUMAN RELATIONS IN THE SOUTH, NOVEMBER 17, 1952

We, the undersigned, have been gratified to note a trend away from appeals to racial and religious bigotry in recent political campaigns in the South, and we have noticed that this trend is largely attributable to effective action taken by numerous interested organizations aware of the implications of appeals to such prejudices in political campaigning. We wish, therefore, to recommend to, to encourage and to join with all interested groups in the South in the adoption of appropriate statements of principle opposing the use of appeals to racial and religious bigotry in future political campaigning.

We request that publicity be given, where appropriate, to such statements of principle, and that all available communications media be used in such publicity. We would remind, and have all interested organizations and groups remind, all local, state and national party organizations and candidates for political office that this position has been taken and made public.

We would suggest, too, that all public media of communication be respectful of their public trust and refuse any and all political advertisements appealing to bigotry.

Dear Walter:

I quite understand the outcome of the proposal to have a Southwide meeting on school segregation, and do not doubt that the decision is, on the whole, a wise one.

There is still the job of getting these various Southern agencies instructed in the things that are coming. As our periodic gathering concerned with human relations is under instructions from its November, '52, meeting at Nashville to hold a new gathering this spring on the subject of segregation in the schools, I am serving as convener for such a meeting at the offices of the ADL in Atlanta at 11 Pryor Street at 10:00 a. m. Friday, March 27.

I've written Mrs. Hurley and explained that there was a flutter of something larger, but that all that is to happen is merely a regular gathering of the Southern groups. And I have expressed the warmest hope that Mrs. Hurley can come, as in ordinary course, as a member of the group.

I am all appreciation for the fruitful two hours with you. I want it to be the harbinger of continually closer cooperation between the NAACP and the Council.

Sincerely,

George S. Mitchell
Executive Director

P. S. You will understand that our gathering is merely the agencies listed to you in my letter of February 23, being those who have customarily come to these meetings. We have never had press people and won't for this one. Our meeting is small and has not hitherto attracted notice. We just want to inform ourselves and plan ahead. I do hope greatly that Mrs. Hurley can come.

Dear George:

The matter of the proposed conference we discussed last Monday was considered carefully and at great length at our Committee on Administration meeting on Monday. The conclusion was reached that it would be exceedingly unwise for the NAACP either to initiate or participate in a conference until the court's decision in the school segregation cases is rendered. Having carried the five cases to the court, there is, in the opinion of our Legal Department, grave danger that the court would consider such a meeting an attempt to bring pressure on the court. For this reason we shall have to wait until the court acts.

I have your letter of February 24. Not knowing how much space was given the announcement of the Fund for the Republic's being given $15 million, I send you the story from the Times. I have not talked with Paul Hoffman yet. But the story seems to indicate a rather considerable shift from the original plan. The one that I have discussed with Paul several times provided that the Fund for the Republic itself would do none of the work but would act only as a distributing agent of funds for specific purposes. This looks as though the Fund is going to do the job itself.

Fifteen million dollars is a lot of money. But it is nowhere near adequate to meet the applications pending before the Ford Foundation in the field of race relations alone. I suggest we hold this in abeyance until I talk with Paul, and I will share with you whatever information I obtain.

Dear Walter:

Further on the matter of a conference on what to do in preparation for the decision of the Supreme Court in the school segregation cases.

The last meeting of the group of agencies concerned with human relations in the South, at Nashville in mid-November, 1952, agreed that the next meeting should occur early in 1953 and should have as its topic "Segregation in the Schools."

The Southern Regional Council could convene the group to meet again, say, in late March of this year. I suggest Fisk University at Nashville as the place for the meeting, with Herman Long again as host. John Hope, for Herman Long, thinks probably space could be had at Fisk for the meeting March 24 and 25 in the International Student Center.

Those who have been coming to the earlier meetings include representatives of your Southeastern Office, the Southeastern Office of the ADL, the Southern Regional Council, the Race Relations Institute at Fisk University, the National Council of Negro Women (Region IV), the Southeastern Office of the National Council of Churches, the Catholic Committee of the South, the Woman's Society of Christian Service of the Methodist Church (Southeastern Jurisdiction), the Southeastern and the Dallas offices of the American Friends Service Committee, the Southeastern representative of the American Jewish Committee, the Southern Field Office of the National Urban League and representatives of various local Urban Leagues, State Divisions of the Southern Regional Council, and the Georgia Interracial Committee.

We have always invited to the meetings and kept informed representatives of the Division of Christian Relations of the Presbyterian Church in the United States, the General Board of Education of the Methodist Church, the Social Service Commission of the Southern Baptist Convention, the Department of Christian Social Relations of the Diocese of Tennessee of the Protestant Episcopal Church, the YWCA National Board (Southern Region), and the Southern Regional Office of the YWCA National Student Council. It would be important to have these latter and some other people present. I think one main reason for their absence in the past has been the problem of expenses.

Here is a list of all of those we would, in ordinary course, invite, plus a list of special people that it would seem to us desirable to bring on. I have put an asterisk by the name of each person who probably would not be able to get to the meeting unless reimbursement for travel were available.

Alex Miller, Director, Anti-Defamation League, Southern Office, Atlanta

Ernest J. Arnold, National Council of the Churches of Christ in the USA, Southeastern Office, Atlanta
Howard Kester, Fellowship of Southern Churchmen, Black Mountain, North Carolina*
Emerson Smith, Department of Interracial Cooperation of the Virginia Council of Churches, Richmond*
Doris Dennison, General Board of Education, the Methodist Church, Nashville Herman Long, Race Relations Department, American Missionary Association, Fisk University, Nashville*
Malcolm P. Calhoun, Division of Christian Relations, Presbyterian Church in the U. S., Atlanta*

Executive Secretary, Social Service Commission, Southern Baptist Convention, Louisville*
Rev. Maurice V. Shean, Catholic Committee of the South, Rock Hill, S. C.*
Philip Ogilvie, Catholic Committee of the South, Rock Hill*
Mrs. W. J. Moulder, Fellowship House of Knoxville*
Rev. Peyton Williams, Secretary of Christian Social Relations, Diocese of Tennessee, Nashville

Additional persons:

Two suitable, unpaid appropriate board members from the Presbyterian Church in the U. S.*
Ditto from the Methodist Church*
Ditto from the Episcopal Church*
Ditto from the Social Service Commission of the Southern Baptist Convention*
Ditto from the National Council of Churches*
Mr. Alfred Hynders, editor, Chattanooga Times*
Ralph McGill, Editor, Atlanta Constitution*
Harry Ashmore, Editor, Arkansas Gazette, Little Rock*
Jonathan Daniels, Editor, News & Observer, Raleigh*
Don Shoemaker, Citizen-Times, Ashville*
James L. Coker, Hartsville, South Carolina, manufacturer*
Morris Abram, Atlanta, lawyer*

To this list I should think you and Mrs. Hurley should be in agreement as to additional persons representing the NAACP, and any others that you may think suitable.

That makes a total of about fifty persons who should be offered reimbursement for their travel. Figuring them at roughly fifty dollars apiece, that is a total of $1,250 for the approximately 25 of the 50 who could be expected surely to turn up. If more than 25 of these reimbursable people came, we would have to have some top expense allowance--say, forty dollars. Anyway, I think with $1,250, the meeting could be swung.

The total number of people who would be invited comes, therefore, to somewhere around 65, and the total that might be expected to be present would be about forty.

I should think the meeting ought to begin at 10:00 a. m. on the 24th and be over after luncheon on the 25th. My personal choice would be against speech-making and in favor of plenty of time for that group to become informed and reach conclusions by discussion.

If these plans seem suitable, let me know as soon as you can, and we will call the group together.

Sincerely,

George S. Mitchell
Executive Director

Dear Walter:

I will give you how far we have got in planning for public reaction on the Supreme Court decision. It falls into two topics: (1) people and machinery and (2) a means of continuing action.

Early in 1952 the Council, working in conjunction with the ADL and various other groups in the South, served as convener for a first meeting of representatives of agencies concerned with human relations in the South. That group has met three times--once in Atlanta, once in Birmingham, and once in Nashville. The Atlanta meeting agreed that there ought to be such a body and called the Birmingham gathering. The Birmingham meeting came in May. Mrs. Hurley made all the arrangements and was really the hostess for it. It drafted and agreed to a statement proposed as policy for the various component organizations about housing needs and bomb violence. See enclosed issue of NEW SOUTH. Those who came to the meeting were asked to cause the statement to be put as a policy matter to the boards of their own organizations for adoption and implementation.

The Nashville meeting was in mid-November, with Herman Long as the convener. It drew up a statement opposing the use of racial and religious prejudice in political campaigns, and those present again were expected to put the statement up to their own boards for adoption and putting into effect. The putting into effect was to mean that organizations and individuals will try to get a good number of resolutions by influential bodies, passed in non-political periods, against political use of prejudice. It was agreed at the Nashville meeting that the next meeting should occur early this year and should have as its topic segregation in the schools.

Those who have been coming to the meetings include representatives of your Southeastern Office, the Southeastern Office of the ADL, the Southern Regional Council, the Race Relations Institute at Fisk University, the Catholic Committee of the South, the Woman's Society of Christian Service of the Methodist Church (Southeastern Jurisdiction), the Southeastern and the Dallas offices of the American Friends Service Committee, the Southeastern representative of the American Jewish Committee, the Southern Field Office of the National Urban League and representatives of various local Urban Leagues, State Divisions of the Southern Regional Council, and the Georgia Interracial Committee.

Others invited and who have not been able to get there, usually because of expense, were appropriate people from the Southern Presbyterian Church, the Southern Baptist Convention, the Department of Christian Social Relations of the Protestant Episcopal Church (Province of Sewanee), the Fellowship of Southern Churchmen, and two or three other similar groups.

All of which merely says that a small body of representatives of interested agencies have been meeting from time to time and are, under their own instructions, to meet soon again on the matter of schools.

Turning now to a longrange program, our thinking has been put on to the continuing task of providing, as controversy and change develop on the whole question from month to month and from year to year, an informed source of information and liberal opinion. The germ of the idea comes, I think, from what the Quakers have been doing in Washington with their small special Community Relations Program, managed by Irene Osborne and Alma Scurlock. About a year and a half ago they began to dig into the facts on the school system in the District of Columbia. Pretty soon they were in position to get out ~~leading~~ mimeographed bulletins to a goodish mailing list of people, showing where discrimination was worst, where it was uneconomical, in what schools and with what classes and in what neighborhoods integration was most pressingly called for, answering simple prejudice wherever it appeared, and pressing the D.C. School Board for action in the Quaker spirit.

Taking a cue from that, we in the Council have thought that a highly desirable step would be to get going in each Southern State at the earliest possible date a private voluntary committee concerned with matters of school and race in each State. Such a committee, to be effective, would have to be assisted by competent paid personnel. Our longrange view is that the whole matter of integration in the Southern schools would be solved within the American democratic system if Southern cities and counties and States did the reasonable and American thing of including, by election or appointment, Negro school board members. Under present circumstances, Negroes have every reason to be suspicious of statements by or on behalf of politicians or school boards as to steps already taken toward equalization or any other steps in the whole matter of integration. As only Kentucky and North Carolina among Southern States have Negro members of the State school boards, the reasonable democratic practice is not available in the other States, and when you come to local school boards, the number with Negro representation is a handful—five or six that we know of.

Under these circumstances, it would seem to us wise to construct in each State a School Committee which would in some sense parallel the State School Board, but which would faithfully represent the interests of all concerned—Negro parents and white parents, Negro teachers and white teachers, Negro teacher training institutions and their white counterparts, and so on. As controversy unfolds, such a committee, armed with facts, could present what seems to them the truth. We suppose that in State after State leading public officials will go before their legislatures and urge appropriations of this or that sum to accomplish this or that change far short of what the law really requires or what public opinion is prepared to agree to. At that point, the spokesman for the School Committee would come forw ard with another estimate of the facts and other recommendations. Thus, the process of decision-taking, State by State, would be with benefit of the conclusions of a non-racial committee, minutely informed as to the school system of the State. Further, we suppose that in the course of four or five years' work by the School Committees, many in each State would see the advantage of straightforward Negro representation, and the normal American democratic solution of Negro representation on the official boards would begin to come into play.

All of that fits in with our major plan for putting full-time paid personnel in each Southern State and developing a really vigorous movement, State by State. That means a lot of money, and we have asked for it but haven't been promised it, and certainly haven't got it.

Meanwhile, we know the urgency of action, think this the desirable course, and have not the funds to proceed to get it under way.

It would be a simple matter to set an early date for the next meeting of the Southwide group at a time that would be suitable to you and others of your associates, and the whole body could confer together. I quite realize that that may be much too limited an assembly to do the exploring you want to do. But I think we would fall in cheerfully with whatever larger plans you might make. But I offer that as a possible course.

If there were some money with which to pay expenses to people to come to an additional meeting of these Southern agencies concerned with human relations, it would be possible to get pretty much all of the groups represented, and that would bring in the church people more effectively than heretofore. I think that these who have been coming to or have been invited to those meetings are pretty much the people that you want to tap for the Southeast. Confessedly, our reach is slim to the Southwest, and maybe something extra and special ought to be done there.

The Southern Regional Council is merely one of the agencies which is accustomed to meeting in this way, and we do not lead or in any way direct the group.

Over and above whatever exploring is done preliminarily, I suppose there ought to be a large Southwide gathering which could bring in really head people in various public opinion groups. All very well to consult closely and privately the operating secretaries of bodies and boards. But necessary to get action in the end to bring in the head people also. Unfortunately, that takes money again, because so many of them hold unpaid offices.

We stand ready to help with the next step, whatever may seem suitable.

Sincerely,

George S. Mitchell
Executive Director

The Southern Regional Council is merely one of the agencies which is accustomed to meeting in this way, and we do not lead or in any way direct the group.

Over and above whatever exploring is done preliminarily, I suppose there ought to be a large Southwide gathering which could bring in really head people in various public opinion groups. All very well to consult closely and privately the operating secretaries of bodies and boards. But necessary to get action in the end to bring in the head people also. Unfortunately, that takes money again, because so many of them hold unpaid offices.

We stand ready to help with the next step, whatever may seem suitable.

Sincerely,

George S. Mitchell

January 30, 1953

Dear George:

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People is seriously concerned with the public relations problems which may be raised by the Supreme Court decisions in the public school segregation cases. We are interested in exploring possible ways and means of meeting such a situation.

We are considering the possibility of calling a conference in the South of public relations experts in that area to see what can be done jointly to meet this issue by way of reaching opinion moulding sources. We would appreciate your reaction to this idea, your suggestions as to an agenda and your recommendations as to persons and representatives of organizations who should be invited to join with us in such an undertaking. The conference, of course, would be interracial and, as we see it now, would be without benefit of publicity. In short, it would be exploratory with the idea of leading to a positive program.

We would appreciate hearing from you at your earliest convenience.

Ever sincerely,

Dear Mrs. Hurley:

Back a couple of weeks ago there was a flutter about enlarging this meeting, getting some money to pay people to come to it, and making it in some sense a joint undertaking of NAACP nationally with the organizations. In the end, that did not get approved by the NAACP people nationally. Wherefore, we are simply convening the meeting like the others, as discussed by the Nashville November meeting.

Do please come over to it. You can contribute greatly to everyone's understanding of the problem involved. And I think it will be a real help to get all those people instructed in the things we're all going to be up against pretty soon.

Sincerely,

Dear Mrs. Hurley:

You will remember that the Nashville meeting of agencies concerned with human relations in the South, last November, wanted another meeting held this spring on the issues involved in school segregation.

This meeting is now called for Friday, March 27, in Atlanta, 10:00 a.m., at the offices of the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, 11 Pryor Street, SW. We expect to be through by 3:30 p.m. ADL will provide lunch. Still no expense money, and we will all have to do our best to get there on our own steam.

Certainly a timely topic, and plenty to talk about. I do greatly hope you or someone from your group can be present.

Sincerely,

Rev. M. J. Ellis
St. George Episcopal Church
Griffin, Ga.

My dear Mr. Ellis:

For a year or so representatives of various groups in the South interested in human relations matters have been coming together informally to discuss particular Southern problems. In May of last year the group met at Birmingham, with housing as the topic. In November we met at Nashville, concerning ourselves with the use of racial and religious prejudice in political campaigns. The Nashville meeting directed that another gathering be held this spring to talk about problems raised by whatever may be the forthcoming decision of the United States Supreme Court on matters of school segregation.

I send you, along with this, minutes of the two earlier meetings, so that you may see who took part and the tenor of our discussions.

Another meeting is to be held Friday, March 27, at 10:00 a.m., in the offices of the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, 11 Pryor Street, S.W., here in Atlanta. We have customarily invited someone from the Episcopal Church, and I do hope it will be possible for you or someone whom you name to come as a formal or informal representative of the Department of Christian Social Relations in this diocese.

The meetings have occurred heretofore without publicity, and they are solely to exchange information and make such joint plans as may be agreeable to all or any of the agencies concerned.

The gathering is autonomous, by which I mean to say that the Southern Regional Council, in serving for this or that meeting as convener, claims no place of leadership among the various agencies invited to attend. I don't know what you may know of our Council, but it has, over the years, had the friendly cooperation of many Episcopalians, and various of our bishops have, from time to time, been on its Board of Directors.

As they tell me out at St. Philip's that you are chairman of Christian Social Relations for the Diocese of Atlanta, I address the invitation to this gathering to you. It would a great pleasure to all of us if you should find it possible to be present.

Sincerely,

Dear Walter:

Here are minutes of the meeting in Atlanta March 27. We were all particularly appreciative of Mrs. Hurley's being present.

The minutes have been sent out not only to the agencies that came but to a long string of others that have been customarily invited to these gatherings.

I am going ahead and asking the head people for the Council in the various States to arrange similar small meetings as early as possible in their States.

OUTLINE ANALYSIS ON THE USE OF BIGOTRY IN POLITICAL CAMPAIGNS

I. Present status of public interest in the issue of using appeals to bigotry in political campaigns.

   A. This year marks the greatest movement in U.S. History towards discrediting bigots.

   B. Political leaders on a large scale have denounced the use of bigotry as a political weapon.

   C. Organized efforts have been made in many communities to stop bigotry through the formation of Fair Election Campaign Committees.

   D. Widespread press coverage has been secured both through straight news releases and editorial comments.

II. Sources of material utilized in this report.

   A. Statements and memorandums from social, intergroup and political agencies.
      1. Those primarily interested in the Jewish segment of the community.
         a. American Jewish Committee
         b. Anti-Defamation League of the B'nai B'rith
         c. Jewish Community Relations Council
      2. Other intergroup-work agencies
         a. Southern Regional Council
         b. American Civil Liberties Union
         c. Philadelphia Fellowship Commission
      3. Political organizations
         a. Democratic National Committee
         b. Republican National Committee
         c. U. S. Senate Committee on Rules and Administration

   B. Newspaper reports and editorials
      1. Large and small daily papers throughout the country
         a. New York Times
         b. Miami Herald
         c. Raleigh News and Observer
         d. Atlanta Constitution
         e. Fall River (Mass.) Herald-News
      2. Papers directed towards minority groups
         a. Jewish Floridian
         b. Southern Isrealite
      3. A strictly political sheet
         a. Georgia Statesman

III. Uses of bigotry

   A. Examples
      1. The distribution of handbills in North Carolina against a gubernatorial candidate on the alleged intention of his to appoint a Negro Paroles Commissioner and end segregation in public schools.

2. The use of previous professorship in Negro schools as an argument against a Congressional candidate in Georgia
3. Gov. Byrnes' appeal to the southern whites to unite to block Truman administration tactics of patronage alliances
4. Gov. Talmadge's fight for the continuation of the County Unit System to maintain segregation in the school system
5. The campaign of an Oregon congressional candidate on a completely anti-Semitic platform
6. Distribution of anti-Semitic literature and defamatory caricatures of Eisenhower by Gerald L. K. Smith
7. Publication of an anti-Semitic "Williams Intelligence Summary" attacking Eisenhower
8. Issuance of Joe Kamp's "Headlines" attacking Eisenhower and using Jewish names in unsavory context as managers of Eisenhower
9. Continuous circulation of reports referring to Eisenhower as a terrible "Swedish Jew," a pro-Communist, a Catholic, a tool of the Jewish barons on Wall Street

B. Breakdown into content and appeal of uses of bigotry
1. Racial slurs
a. Content
i. Issue of mixed schools as the beginning of the end of segregation in the South
ii. Pronouncement that FEPC is an infringement on the rights of the states and of the southern people
b. Appeal -- Since this type of program was carried out primarily on a regional basis, its appeal would be centered among the State's Rights and pro-segregation people
2. Anti-Semitic literature
a. Content
i. Pamphlets by professional hate mongers, most of which attacked Eisenhower and favored MacArthur
ii. Circulation of rumors with anti-Semitic connotations with some press coverage on a local level
b. Appeal
i. Widespread appeal to fanatics and among those who are known to be professional hate mongers.
ii. Pressure seems also to have been exerted upon the politically naive, the uninformed, and the easily impressed.

IV. Evaluation of the issue in terms of present and future activities
A. Especially significant is the work accomplished thus far in securing the pledge of political leaders to eliminate bigotry in political campaigns and in bringing these pronouncements before the public
B. The program has been aided a great deal by the cooperation of various agencies, responsible citizens, and the press
C. It is suggested that this program be carried on, incorporating with present activity a program of increased education for the politically naive and uninformed voter even in times of less emphasis on political campaigns. Both the media of mass communication and personal contact could be effectively utilized in carrying out such a program, with the goal in mind that bigotry on a large scale will end when intelligent voters have a type of awareness which is not susceptible to these types of material and charges.

OUTLINE REPORT ON THE USE OF BIGOTRY IN POLITICAL CAMPAIGNS:

No previous election year in the history of the United States has seen a greater movement than the present one towards discrediting bigots and the use of bigotry in election campaigns. Statements from both Republican and Democratic Committee chairmen, from local and federal political leaders, and from prominent members of many communities denouncing the use of bigotry as a campaign weapon, have been distributed widely and publicized through straight news coverage and in editorial comments from the Press. An organized effort at carrying this program to the local level has been maintained through the establishment of Fair Election Campaign Committees in communities where there is any liklihood that such a committee could become necessary as a seat of reference and judgement on accusations of bigotry and also as a foundation for continuing these policies in future election years and political campaigns. While we have no statement of the number of such committees which have been formed or the results of their efforts, the widespread publicity which the movement has received in its campaign against political bigotry is an indication of public arousal and denial of such tactics.

The material for this report has been taken from a variety of sources, including statements and memorandums from social, intergroup, and political agencies which have had a particular interest in the denouncement of bigotry in politics. Among these have been: the American Jewish Committee, Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, Southern Regional Council, American Civil Liberties Union, Philadelphia Fellowship Commission, Jewish Community Relations Council, the Democratic National Committee, Republican National Committee and the United States Senate Committee on Rules and Administration. In addition both news articles and editorials have been utilized from papers which represent a cross section of large and small dailies, those directed toward minority groups, and a strictly political sheet. Some of these were: the New York Times, Miami Herald, Raleigh News and Observer, Atlanta Constitution, Fall River (Mass.) Herald-News, Jewish Floridian, Southern Isrealite, and the Georgia Statesman.

To most clearly show the work of bigots, a number of examples will be cited:

Early in May, handbills were distributed in large numbers in Eastern North Carolina against the election of Hubert Olive for governor due to his alleged intention to appoint a Negro as head of the Parole's Commission and to end segregation in public schools. The handbills showed Olive with his campaign committee members, one of whom was identified as a Negro, with the following copy: "...Before you vote May 31, ask yourself two questions: Do you want a Negro Paroles Commissioner? Do you want your children to go to school with Negroes?" This incident was brought before the courts as a test case of the laws governing the distribution of handbills as a part of campaign procedure in North Carolina.

During the Georgia congressional race between James Davis and Baxter Jones, an advertisement, "paid for by friends of Congressman Davis", appeared in the Atlanta Journal, critical of Jones for teaching at Atlanta University and Morehouse College, institutions for Negroes. The advertisement also declared that "Congressman Davis has declined to mention the above facts because he did not want to say anything to create religious or race bitterness in the community."

Preceding the Democratic Convention, Governor James Byrnes of South Carolina again appealed to the white people of the Southern states, "the biggest minority in this country", to block the "antagonisms of the Truman administration and the political pressures exerted by big-city minority groups through patronage alliances."

In the September 4, 1952 issue of the "Statesman", Herman Talmadge again makes his stand urging voters to show their wish to continue the County Unit Amendment. This issue headlines that: "A vote for the county unit amendment is a vote against: 1) Mixed schools, 2) Boss rule, 3), Organized crime, 4) County consolidation." This theme is carried throughout the paper with particular emphasis on the destruction of segregated patterns of life if the county unit system is not maintained.

In Oregon, Kenneth A. Brown sought a Republican Congressional nomination on an out-in-out anti-Semitic platform, ascribing all the country's ills to the Jews.

Gerald L. K. Smith first started his political anti-Semitic literature during the bitterly contested New Hampshire primary. He has continued these efforts through posters and leaflets for MacArthur under the name of "Independent Republicans", with defamatory caricatures attacking Eisenhower. Also at the Convention, Smith was present representing the "Patriotic Tract Society" distributing leaflets with a drawing of George Washington with the face of General MacArthur.

Robert H. Williams started a year ago to promote MacArthur, attacking Eisenhower, through the publication of a strictly anti-Semitic "Williams Intelligence Summary".

Prior to the Convention, Joe Kamp flooded the mails with copies of his latest issue of "Headlines", which attacked Eisenhower with strong anti-Semitic connotations and supported Taft. Jewish names were used in unsavory context and reported to be backers or managers of Eisenhower.

Continuous reports were circulated referring to Eisenhower as a "terrible Swedish Jew", a statement taken from the 1915 edition of the West Point year book. These reports, however, neglected to mention that the commentary in this year book is supposedly of a humerous nature.

These examples are but a few of those which might be enumerated as evidence of bigotry in the political campaigns this year. We note first of all a general breakdown into direct racial slurs and anti-Semitic literature. In the racial area, the content centered around the issue of mixed schools as the beginning of the end of segregation in the South. In addition, both Governor Byrnes and Governor Talmadge proclaimed federal FEPC as an infringement on the rights of the states and the southern people. The appeal of this type of bigotry is obviously directed in a regional nature, towards the states rights and pro-segregation people. Undoubtedly if this type of bigotry were carried out more widely throughout the country,it would gain an appeal in many sectors; however, racial emphasis has been on a regional plane for the most part.

Anti-Semitic literature, on the other hand, has been much more widely distributed. It can be most generally broken down into the type put out by professional hate mongers, of which but a few examples have been mentioned, and that which has crept into smaller community politics with some press coverage through naivety and ignorance on the part of those who have been approached by the hate mongers and their material. The outstanding example of this type of activity was shown in the example of Eisenhower labelled as a "Swedish Jew". Variations on this theme have presented Eisenhower as a pro-Communist, a Catholic, a tool of the Jewish barons on Wall Street, etc. It is much more difficult to show here the type of appeal that these statements, rumors, and pamphlets exert. Bigotry has been denounced severely throughout the country in newspapers and by political leaders; however, the work of these professional hate mongers and others appears to be based more on an appeal to fanatics and to the uninformed and easily impressed.

Perhaps it is on this standpoint that the issues should be most seriously considered in terms of present and future activity. The work accomplished thus far by Fair Election Campaign Committees and others interested in the problem has been significant in securing the pledge of political leaders to eliminate bigotry in federal campaigns and in bringing these pronouncements before the public. It may be possible that these and other responsible citizens could incorporate with this program one of increased education for the informed and politically naive voter, on such a plane that there would be an increased awareness of issues and personalities even in times that carry less emphasis on politics and campaigns than the present. Both the media of mass communication and personal contact could be effectively utilized in carrying out such a program, which would eventually mean the end of bigotry on a large scale due to the lack of "takers" for such kinds of material and charges.

Foreword

DEMOCRACY AND THE CONSTITUTION

At this time, when the forces of the democracies are waging successful war against totalitarianism in all corners of the world, the Alabama Policy Committee has considered it appropriate and obligatory to devote attention to the extension of democracy here at home. To that end the program of the Thirteenth Alabama Policy Conference was built around the general subject, Democracy and the Constitution.

Recognizing that the strength of all organized society rests in the smaller units of government, and depends upon a sense of responsibility and the active participation of the individual citizen in local government, the subject of Local Government and Democracy was discussed in relation both to taxation and finance and to state legislation and local autonomy.

Knowing also that Alabama's suffrage pattern is the most burdensome, restrictive and undemocratic of any of the United States, and perhaps of any state or nation operating under a republican or representative form of government, the important subject of Suffrage and Elections was considered from the angles of history, registration, voting qualifications, and apportionment.

On Local Government.—The problem of local government has been of considerable interest to the Alabama Policy Committee since its organization in 1936. On the important subject of "Integrating State and Local Taxation" the Fourth Alabama Policy Conference, October 22, 1937, had this to say:

> "The problem of raising money for operation of State Government is closely related to the financing of counties, municipalities and boards of education. In considering the state ad valorem tax, for example, it should be remembered that of a $2.10 average rate throughout the state, only twenty-five cents goes to the State Government's General Fund, ten cents to the Pension Fund, and thirty cents to the Public School Fund. During the fiscal year 1936-37 the total ad valorem tax received by the state was only about $6,000,000 as against a total of $19,000,000 for state, county and school district (but not for municipal) purposes. Half of the gasoline tax goes to the counties and many municipalities impose an additional levy. Other revenues such as the sales tax and alcoholic beverage income go in part to local government, and that derived from the poll tax goes in its entirety to the counties where raised. Local licenses are generally imposed at the rate of 50 per cent of those levied by the state. Obviously the state and local revenue problems must be coordinated.
> "There is another aspect of the local revenue problem which bears directly on that of the state. That is the increasing practice of providing counties, road districts and boards of education with state-raised funds. The people of the state as a whole have an interest in the diffusion of good schools and good roads and other elements in the development of our state, which justified the principle of equalization. But the principle may be extended to a point where local participation in the burden of public expenditures may lag, and where gross inequalities in our tax structure may arise among the several counties."

The problems suggested in the above paragraphs are still paramount today, and were discussed with some variance in philosophy by the panel members. They threw light on the problems of distribution of governmental services, which continue to increase, between local units and the state and improvement of the participation of the local unit in financing them.

Suffrage and Elections Amendment Proposed.—After the discussions on suffrage and elections, the Conference voted to recommend that the Legislature submit the following paragraphs on Suffrage and Elections as an amendment to the Constitution in lieu of the present Suffrage and Election sections. They are sections approved for the Proposed Model Constitution for Alabama by the Sixth Alabama Policy Conference, February 10-11, 1939, and were adopted from the Model Constitution of the National Municipal League:

> "Every citizen of the United States, of the age of twenty-one years, who shall have been a resident of the state one year preceding the election, and of the county, precinct or election district in which he resides, such time as may be provided by law, shall have the qualification of an elector.
> "The Legislature shall provide by law a system by which electors absent from their voting residence on election day shall not be denied the privilege of voting.
> "For the purpose of voting, no person shall be deemed to have gained residence by reason of his presence or to have lost it by reason of his absence while in the service of the United States, of the state government, of a municipality of the state, or while navigating the waters of the United States or the high seas, or while a student of an institution, or while kept at an institution at public expense, or while confined in prison.
> "The voting residence of a married moman shall be where she actually resides, and shall not be determined by the residence of her husband.
> "An American citizen otherwise qualified to vote shall not be deemed to have lost her privilege by marriage to an alien.
> "No poll tax shall be levied as a requirement for voting."

These simple provisions leave the responsibility of providing registration and election procedures to the Legislature, which is where it should rest.

On Suffrage and Elections.—In addition to the above action regarding Suffrage and Elections, at the Fourth Alabama Policy Conference in October, 1937, the organization made the following recommendation regarding the poll tax:

> "Poll Tax.—As a source of revenue the poll tax is not important. As a voting qualification it is undemocratic and tends permanently to disfranchise a substantial part of the electorate. We recommend its abolition through appropriate amendment to the Constitution. If this should not prove practicable, we recommend, as an alternative, that the cumulative provisions of the law be reduced to a maximum not to exceed two years."

The sentiment of the recent Conference was substantially the same, with the exception that complete abolition was generally advocated. As is indicated by the proposed amendment, complete removal of all restrictions on suffrage was generally favored, with a number somewhat insistent that a reasonable educational or literacy test should be retained. Reduction of the residence requirement to one year was approved.

While most of the panel members pointed to the poll tax as the chief cause of disfranchisement of hundreds of thousands of Alabamians who are qualified to vote intelligently, Mr. Ray insisted that the system of registration was the heart of a sound election system. In his discussion of the history of the ballot, Mr. Dowling declared that for more than five hundred years the trend had been toward a more and more liberal franchise, that property tests and any tax qualifications were more and more unpopular, that the absentee ballot was generally approved, and that the secret ballot was a necessity in a democracy.

The consensus of opinion was that Alabama had reached a stage educationally, politically and otherwise, which demanded, and that Alabama's place in the nation required, removal of the undemocratic and burdensome barriers to suffrage, development of a straight-forward, accurate, and permanent registration plan, and a strictly secret ballot.

Personal and Editorial Opinion.—It is always the objective of the Alabama Policy Committee to present all sides of a controversial issue. As has been indicated, the Conference as a whole was for general electoral reform. Speakers for the opposition and others known to favor the present system were invited to participate in the discussions but could not attend. Toward affording a more complete coverage for Legislators and others who may wish to use this publication in studying the question, varying points of view are presented in Personal and Editorial Comment, page 48. It is, however, pertinent to note that within the last few years, personal and editorial comment as reflected through the state press shows a marked trend toward state repeal of the poll tax and general improvement of our election system. For those who are interested, the arguments for repeal by Congress are carried on page 38.

Charts and Maps.—To throw further light on the subject, charts and maps, illustrating the adverse effects of our present suffrage laws were presented to the Conference. One chart (see pages 30, 31) comparing the poll-tax states with the non-poll-tax states shows how voting falls short in the poll-tax states. For statistical table, see appendix, page 46. In the Southern States 27.9 per cent of the potential voting population voted in the 1944 presidential election, whereas the percentage was 61.9 in other states. In the eight poll tax states—Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Mississippi, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia—only 19 per cent voted, but in North Carolina, Louisiana and Florida, Southern States which have repealed the poll tax, 32.6 per cent voted. Alabama ranked next to the lowest with only 16 per cent. Georgia repealed the poll tax in February, 1945.

A second chart (page 4) compares voting in Alabama with voting in the States of Kentucky and Tennessee in presidential elections from 1872 to 1944. Readers will find much to reflect about in this chart, but we shall mention here only these rather obvious facts: In Kentucky, with no poll tax and only a one year residence requirement, votes cast range from a high of 88 per cent to a low of 53 per cent of the potential voting population. In Tennessee, which has a poll tax of $1.00 which is not cumulative and no other restrictions, the vote ranged between 67 and 20 percent. In Alabama, with a cumulative poll tax since 1901 of $1.50 cumulative for 24 years to $36.00, a two year residence requirement, limited registration periods, and other restrictions, the vote drops from a high of 65 per cent in 1872 to a low of 14 per cent in 1924, with an average of only 19 per cent since 1901 and of only 16 per cent in the last six elections. The people of these three states are very much alike in background, but it is only fair to point out that the Negro population differs—nine per cent in Kentucky, 16 per cent in Tennessee, and 35 per cent in Alabama. Kentucky's average vote since 1901 has been 67 per cent and Tennessee's 34 per cent, as compared with Alabama's 19 per cent.

The 1901 Constitution.—Although other Southern States were setting up barriers to free registration and suffrage at the time, those developed by the 1901 Constitutional Convention in Alabama represented by far the most drastic departure from the past. Alabama had come into the Union in 1819 with general white manhood suffrage, the first state to be admitted without economic restrictions on voting since Vermont in 1791. Provisions of the 1819 Constitution were practically repeated in 1861 and 1865. In 1868, the so-called "Carpet-bag" Constitution provided for universal manhood suffrage, enfranchising the Negroes, but excepting certain important white men. In 1875, Alabama came in for another homerule Constitution, this time providing for universal manhood suffrage without racial discrimination. It extended the franchise to all male persons twenty-one years of age or over, citizens and foreigners who had declared their intention to become citizens, who had resided in the state for one year, in the county for three months, and in the precinct or ward for thirty days immediately preceding the election.

Convention Views on the Suffrage Provisions.—Much remains to be done in recording the history of the Constitutional Convention of 1901, the real reasons for its being assembled, the marked division among members on the suffrage proposals, the influence of the railroads, the conduct of the election on November 11, 1901, and so on. The discussions and editorial comments which follow throw considerable light on the main purposes of the Convention, chief of which were to limit the electorate and to protect the corporations.

These statements show the range of opinion in the Convention on important phases of the suffrage sections: Thomas L. Bulger of Tallapoosa County declared with humor, "What we would like to do in this country, more than any other two things, would be to disfranchise the darkies and educate white children." Mike Sollie of Dale spoke against the educational and property qualifications, declaring them a radical departure from our time-honored customs. He plead for the "young men who had been kept between the plow handles until twenty-one years old and were then turned loose with five or ten dollars, without education, without property." William H. Samford of Pike County urged that the poll tax be left to the Legislature and not written into the Constitution.

Ex-Governor Thomas W. Jones, of Montgomery, Frank S. White, of Birmingham, S. H. Dent, of Eufaula, and George H. Harris of Opelika, opposed the so-called "grandfather clause", recognizing that it along with the poll tax would result in the disfranchisement of many white people.

William C. Fitts of Tuscaloosa plead against the poll tax. "Little as it seems to men who occupy seats upon this floor, it is an important factor to men of little material substance, and of considerable character in various portions of the hill country of this state.... It is useless to say patriotism will prompt payment and inspire an approbation of this article in the Constitution. Patriotism is good enough to be talked about, but when patriotism is connected with the payment of a tax, the payment of the tax comes nearest home, and patriotism takes a back seat". J. B. Duke of Chambers County endorsed this statement, declaring, "A great many people all over the white counties do not have $1.50 at the end of the year, but come out in debt. There are white men in this country who, rather than pay $1.50 would surrender their vote. You may say as much as you please that they are not patriotic, but I say they are."

N. B. Spears, of St. Clair County, "stood on the rock of universal suffrage, where the fathers of 1776 had stood. I stand", he declared, "where Jefferson stood when he declared in the face of kings and tyrants that all men were created equal and endowed with certain inalienable rights, that taxation without representation is oppression, that all governments are founded on the consent of the governed".

More Whites Than Negroes Barred.—Governor William J. Samford had agreed to include in his platform a plank calling for a constitutional convention only when assured that no white man would be barred from voting. The Conference found however in studying the map shown on page 8 that in 1941-42 some 600,000 white persons were disfranchised as against 520,000 Negroes. Of 440,291 persons registered in that year, only 176,474 paid poll taxes. In most counties more whites are disfranchised than are registered. In Jefferson only 65,000 of a potential white voting population of 175,584 are registered. In Madison County, only one third of potential white voters are listed on registration records.

Did the Constitution Pass in 1901?—A study of the map on the opposite page almost convinced the Conference that the 1901 Conference was not legally adopted. The vote for the Constitution was 108,613, the vote against, 81,734. The majority for the Constitution was 26,879. Thirty-four counties gave majorities for the Constitution, thirty-three counties (including Houston), against. It is significant that in at least seventeen counties, more votes were cast than the total number of white males twenty-one years of age or over. In the Counties of Dallas, Hale, and Wilcox, 17,983 votes were cast, or 12,360 more than the total white male voting population of 5,623. The surplus vote in these three counties represent nearly half of the majority. The questions raised by members of the Conference were: With such figures from only three counties, is it not possible that the majority votes were votes of Negroes who were to be deprived of their franchise by the very Constitution they were voting in? Or did they represent irregularity in voting? Or in counting? Whatever the answer, to members of the Conference it looked bad, wrong, immoral, and they thought the general public would be interested in speculating on this situation.

Alabama Governors on Poll Tax Reform. — Ev-Governor Bibb Graves. as a candidate for re-election, declared February 1, 1934, in his platform.

> "I favor amending the Constitution and law so as to reduce the cumulative poll tax requirement to three years next preceding the election at which the ballot is offered. A three year requirement by antedating the last preceding general election will protect our suffrage and will prevent campaign slush funds from being poured in to control pending elections."

Frank M. Dixon, in his campaign platform, declared: "I advocate re-

As this bulletin goes to press, Governor Chauncey Sparks has just declared in his message to the Legislature, May 1,

> In my judgment, the cumulative feature . . . is a deterrent to the exercise of the franchise by many of our best people. Many of our citizens neglect or forget to pay their poll tax. Several successive years of neglect or forgetfulness pile up a real barrier. This restraint upon the exercise of the ballot tends to reduce the number of voters and makes it easier for political wrongs to flourish.

> "The poll tax is not a qualification for voting, but rather a 'condition precedent' to use of the ballot. The procedure through which the ballot is kept pure is registration, not the payment of poll tax."

LOCAL GOVERNMENT: FINANCIAL AND GOVERNMENTAL STRUCTURE

W. C. Beebe, Bay Minette

County and Municipal Revenue Inadequate.—One of the major problems confronting local governments in Alabama is finance.

Counties have no taxing power except that given by the Constitution or by legislative authorization. Under the Constitution a county may levy a five mill tax for general purposes and a two and one-half mill tax for roads and public buildings. These rates were fixed by the Constitution in 1901 before the major services were contemplated and were probably ample under the then governmental functions and services. Since that time not only has the cost of the maintenance of the offices and courts increased but numerous services have been added, the major ones of which are public health, agricultural extension work, and public welfare. These services cost from thirty to forty thousand dollars in the smaller counties. If Baldwin is above the average county in valuation, it is only slightly above the average in population and is below the average in the number on public relief rolls. Hence, we can assume the costs of these services for Baldwin to be the average in the State.

It will not be denied that these services are proper if not essential. They were placed on the counties by legislative enactment, since the tax rate was fixed in 1901. An eight million dollar assessed valuation at five mills is required to provide these services alone. More than two-thirds of the counties have a valuation of less than eight million dollars. The same county, Baldwin, for 1944, spent, and properly spent, $44,000 for general governmental purposes. It is generally conceded that $40,000 for general governmental purposes, exclusive of public services, is the minimum requirement for an effective county operation. Actually then a county cannot properly function and meet the required public services on less than $80,000 a year. Only a few counties in the state have an income of that amount.

This does not mean that even those counties having this income could without additional funds meet their needs, for in these counties the cost of government is materially more. Their population is greater and hence the cost of public service is greater. It does mean that the rate and subjects of taxation allocated to the counties in 1901 is insufficient to meet the increased burdens placed on them. The state allotted to them one-third of the business license taxes. This did not materially help. In many counties the tax is negligible, totaling less than $400,000 to them all, with nearly half of that going to the three large counties. The rural counties, and only a few fell without this classification, have no taxable wealth other than tangible properties. There is therefore no way of permitting them to help themselves to a degree sufficient to meet the demands on them. The counties of necessity have turned to the State for a share of the State's revenues. The 1935 Legislature to meet the situation allotted to them a portion of the sales tax. In 1943 they were given additional moneys from the sales tax and from the liquor profits. The demands on the counties is still growing. Hence they are again appealing to the Legislature for relief.

The municipalities were in like manner set up on a tax structure in 1901 on a basis of their then functions and services. They too were given a five mill tax and limited business licenses. Their needs have grown. They are chargeable with public health and public welfare. Though not chargeable with agricultural extension, other demands are made on them, such as garbage disposal, public parks, fire protection and now airports. While in theory they have a more flexible taxing power, actually the State tax structure is such as to restrict them as effectively as the counties. When the Legislature demanded participation in services or new services of them they have of necessity turned to the Legislature for funds. Their participation in state revenues has been confined to a portion of liquor profits and a small sum from gasoline taxes. They, too, are before the Legislature for relief.

With each new concession of state funds to the local governments there necessarily goes increased state control over them. Local autonomy is nearing a state of extinction. Under our present plan of support of the public services, the State says to the local unit "You must bear a portion of the cost of these services." The local unit says "I'd gladly do this but I haven't the money". The State replies "That's all right. Here is the money, put it up". Local participation is a fiction. The whole scheme is farcical and destructive of the foundations of democracy. It destroys local consciousness, governmental and individual, of responsibility for local services. Without this sense of responsibility for government, organized society will crumble.

I can find no remedy except to abandon this farce. Allocate to the State those functions and services which are primarily state-wide and to the local units those which are purely local. Make it possible for each to meet these needs and hold each responsible for them.

Governmental Structure Antiquated.—The counties face another problem. As they are trying to operate on a 1901 financial structure, so are they also trying to operate on a 1901 governmental structure.

In 1901 the only function of a county was to maintain order, the only service was to provide wagon roads. Road work consisted of cutting away trees and shrubbery, filling holes and finding approaches to creek fords. The work was done by those living along the road. For ten days each year able bodied men were summoned out to work their road and to bring a pick, shovel or a hoe. It was a gala day in the community, bordering on a picnic. Little work was done, little was required. Under the then conditions a local man was needed to determine when this most fitted crop conditions and a suitable place to congregate. Hence, the county was partitioned into districts, a commissioner was elected for each district. There was no need for other governmental service, no need for county wide planning. Hence there was none then.

Road conditions have changed with the advent of the automobile, road needs expanded to county wide, state wide, nation wide. A different type of road is required. Planning construction and maintenance have become a technical problem. Yet in many counties we cling to the old governmental machinery, four commissioners from four districts, four pots of road money, without unity of planning or technical efficiency in construction and maintenance.

This antiquated machinery likewise precludes unity in planning other services or to be more exact, precludes the county's undertaking other services and functions. A list of such other services now contemplated for the counties but now dormant would be a yard long. There are numerous unincorporated communities without lights, water and sewerage. There are numerous incorporated communities in Alabama too small in population and taxable wealth to support separate corporate functions. Their incorporation, with the incident burdens, are a direct result of the county's failure to function. These services can be furnished by the county with little or no charge on county funds. There are other dormant county services.

The remedy to this condition is a smaller compact unit of government, county-wide in service and responsibility in planning, with the county as the unit, and entrusting technical work to technicians.

The defects pointed out will be remedied gradually. The remedies proposed will not be accepted overnight. The public must first see the defect, then desire the remedy. The people are entitled to, they have always got and always will get just that government, from the standpoints of efficiency, economy, and integrity, that they can conceive, ordain and maintain, no better and no worse.

Local officials alone are not to be charged with the conditions pointed out. They are intelligent, honest and diligent. They want to do a good job for their people. When you weigh the resources at their disposal and the handicaps under which they labor with the results they give, I believe you will concede a good job is being done.

NEW LIFE FOR LOCAL GOVERNMENT

Joseph M. Ray, University

Most of the discussion thus far has been devoted strictly to the subject of local finance. I would agree that finance is a basic consideration in all discussions on government. Finance, to be sure, is the sine qua non. There are many other problems in connection with local government, however, which deserve equal attention from us.

First, let me say a few things about local finance. It would seem to me that we cannot meet the evils outlined by Mr. Beebe which are engendered by local need for funds and by the necessity of squeezing those local funds from the State Treasury without giving a fuller measure of autonomy to the localities in the tax field. If, as Mr. Beebe says, most of the poorer counties have no possible source of revenue save the property tax, then I see only the State as the source of local funds or, in line with Mr. Browder's suggestion, a deliberately designed program to implement state policy by some means other than through the counties as presently constituted. I quite agree that a county like Washington County has a pressing tax problem at present and that it has little or no source of revenue other than the property tax. The suggestion that, from the point of view of state politics, it would be more wholesome for the State to take over the entire task of financing programs such as health and welfare does not take fully into account the so pressing need for measures to invigorate and stimulate local government.

This brings me to my second point, which, although it involves finance, is a much broader consideration: the need to infuse new life into our local democracy. This concept has been phrased frequently and in many ways. I feel, nevertheless, that it is urgently necessary for our local governments to be active and effective democratic units. In many respects the performance of our local governments is the measure of the effectiveness of our democratic procedures. If local government is not efficient or is corrupted, it is too often the case that this distortion of the local will is projected on to the state level and the national level.

The burden is upon us, therefore, to look to our local governments particularly in matters of organization and personnel to the end that our local democracy may be a more accurate reflection of the popular will and may bring about a more adequate effectuation of declared policy. And, finally, I am fearful that a forthright state policy of footing the whole bill in programs such as health and welfare will result in the further impairment of the initiative and vigor of local government. I would prefer to see instituted a more complete system of shared taxes, whereby the locality comes into more adequate revenues with more autonomy and discretion in their expenditures.

Following his discussion, Mr. Beebe called to the attention of the Conference a number of recommendations of the Interim Committee of the Legislature on State, County and Municipal Government, in particular the following:

1. A proposal for a constitutional amendment providing that in the future no general obligation bonds could be issued by counties or cities unless the people, at the time of voting on the bonds, concurrently voted an authority for levying from year to year the amount of taxes necessary to amortize fully the bonds voted upon. This would serve the double purpose of reducing the amount of bonds voted to amounts actually needed and would markedly reduce the interest rates.

2. The creation of an Alabama Finance Corporation through which the State could protect its political subdivision, by the purchase of their bonds, against high rates of interest and other excessive costs to the taxpayers.

3. The abolishment of the system under which county commissioners are elected by and from districts, a system the result of which is that each commissioner tends to become an overlord for his district, and which prevents the employment of competent engineering service.

4. The creation of a commission form of government, the commission to consist of three members whose compensation are salaries based upon the county's financial level. Authority under the recommended plan would be vested in the commission as a whole, and each commissioner would be charged with the duty of administering commission policy in a functional field.

5. Amendment of the present city manager law to remove the population restriction now embodied therein so that any city or town, regardless of population, may avail itself of the benefits of this advance toward efficient and economical municipal operation.

He stressed the following recommendation of the Committee:

6. "The state, the counties, and the municipalities are participating in almost every source of revenue. We have pointed out that the present tax structure has frozen local revenues, retarded local effort, rewarded local indolence, and increased local pressure for participation in state funds. We recommend further study of this problem. We believe that a separation proper level of government and to strengthen all levels of government. Centralization of government, if it be an evil, and we believe it is, has its roots in the failure of the local government to meet its responsibilities. The criticism applies to state in its relationship to the national government as well as to local governments in their relationship to the state. The strength of all organized society rests in the smallest unit of government, in the local unit's consciousness of its responsibility for local needs and in its willingness and ability to meet these needs. Except as these needs are recognized and met in smaller units, the individual citizen has no personal, individual sense of responsibility for government. The personal, individual sense of responsibility on the part of the citizenry is the foundation of democracy. It is our firm conviction that the trek of each unit of government to the unit above for maintenance of its services is in direct conflict with our theory of government and leads to disruption and ultimately to government solely from above. We, therefore, recommend that to each level of government there be allotted particular functions and services and that each level be charged with responsibility for these functions and services and rendered capable of providing them."

7. Expansion of the functions of the division of local finance to offer other than financial aid to local government.

General Discussion.—Although Mr. Beebe and Mr. Ray differed on the matter of division of services to state and local government, they were in agreement on the fact that as services are increased, revenue to finance them must be provided. Discussion by the Conference was directed chiefly to the matter of finding more adequate revenue for local services. The answer lay primarily, it was agreed, in the answer to the big question: How may income from the ad valorem tax be improved?

To Chairman Smith's question as to how local tax limitations might be unfrozen, Mr. Beebe called attention to one solution which was to be proposed at the coming session of the Legislature. All income from the property tax is now spent locally with the exception of income from the State's six and one-half mills. The proposal is to permit all income from this portion in excess of the amount raised in a given year, say 1944, to go back to the county for expenditure. Mr. Beebe believes such a provision will do more than anything else to reverse the tendency of the counties to lower property assessments.

To the suggestion that what is needed is greater authority in the state to require the equalization of property assessments, Mr. Dowling pointed out that the law provides adequate authority at present. What is lacking, he declared, is evidence in the office of the State Revenue Department sufficient to warrant the requesting of a county to raise assessments. He stated that his office now has four men devoting full time to the advising of counties in this field. A bill to be introduced into the Legislature shortly is designed to provide the necessary information for requesting equalization. This bill, Mr. Dowling said, will provide an intelligent inventory of property within a county—a complete appraisal by competent appraisers. He stated that the average assessment in the state was between 40 and 45 per cent instead of the 60 per cent required by the Constitution. Spot checking, he said, showed that little properties generally were assessed higher than large properties—often between 60 and 120 per cent, as compared with around 30 per cent for large plantations. What is needed, he insisted, is accurate evidence, which will be provided by the system of appraising to be recommended.

II. DEMOCRACY AND REPRESENTATION

Panel: I. J. Browder, State Personnel Director, Montgomery, Chairman; H. G. Dowling, Commissioner of Revenue, Montgomery; Joseph M. Ray, Bureau of Public Administration, University; Harry M. Ayers, Editor, Anniston Star, Anniston; Mrs. Harvey M. Emerson, Birmingham; Mrs. L. S. Evins, Womans Society of Christian Service, North Alabama Methodist Conference, Birmingham; Charles N. Feidelson, Columnist, Birmingham News, Birmingham; Carey E. Haigler, Regional Director, Congress of Industrial Organizations, Birmingham.

The Chairman, Mr. Browder, introduced the general subject briefly, making brief remarks regarding the areas to be discussed, and stressing the importance of such a discussion at this time. Mr. Ayers, who could not be present, submitted a statement which was read to the Conference.

THE STORY OF THE BALLOT

H. G. Dowling, Montgomery

Note: Dr Dowling's paper as presented at the Conference was a comprehensive account of the ballot from Ancient Times to the present day. On account of space limitations, only those parts of his paper are presented here which have a direct bearing upon balloting in the United States. Interesting topics which have been omitted include balloting in Ancient Greece and Rome, the feudal period and the development of the estates and guilds, the influence of the Church on voting procedures, voting practices in England, France, Germany, Italy, and Russia.

The ballot has been indeed for centuries a weapon of great power and effect. Any study of its history and of men's best thinking and dangerous striving towards its proper employment will support this statement. Furthermore, a look at the record of this tool of democracy will leave an honest thinker amazed at the defects surviving and at the public apathy and ignorance which so long have prevented the refurbishing, sharpening, and wise usage of such an instrument.

Ancient Balloting.—Make a trip with me for a few moments back to the spot where the ballot first clearly emerged, to the meeting-place of the Demos, the citizenry, of a city of ancient Greece. The Greeks of Athens, the citizens of the family or tribe, are met to fix the government of their city. Citizenship and voting are inseparable. Voting is not a right or a privilege. It is an integral part of being an Athenian. It was acquired by blood, by birth, or by special grant of the government. "Freedom of the city" means citizenship and therefore voting rights. Foreign population, no matter what the length of residence or the wealth or power has nothing to do with government unless citizenship has been granted by decree. So, together as one body and in one place, the people gathered to fix their governmental events.

Tacitus, the Roman historian, tells about voting in the tribes of Germany at about 69 A.D. The chiefs, who had won their places usually by military powess, would call together the members of a tribe to pass upon pending propositions—"Shall we move the village to a new site? Shall we cross the Rhine and plunder the fields of the Celts? Shall such and such a leader succeed one recently lost?" The German citizens met in full armor, weapons in hand, for the election. As a proposition was submitted by the chief, the people expressed approval by cheers, loud huzzas. If the proposal was not favored, the voters created a great clanging of metal by clashing their weapons together. Their vote became the action of the tribe.

Across the North Sea in Angle-land, England, our rude forefathers voted very much in the fashion of their German kinsmen. They met to hear the chief's suggestions. (Julius Caesar says the chief was sometimes a woman!) If they approved, the voters showed their attitude by cheers. If they voted in the negative, this was shown by silence.

It is important to note that in all this early stage of voting, citizenship and suffrage were one and inseparable for adult males; and there was probably some voting by women. However, the suffrage was limited to those inhabitants who by blood belonged to the tribe and to those few who for some special reason had been granted the status of "freemen". The voting list did not nearly include all inhabitants.

A General Movement.—Through the Medieval Age and on to our times, the movement for wider suffrage and more direct participation in government has been noticeable in nearly all nations. Japan has been through the same process as European countries and has met her problems largely by imitation of Germany. Italy was making progress against a lethargy created partly by her church and against terrible corruption in politics, until Mussolini seized power just after World War One. Austria, Hungary, Roumania, and Turkey have had long and sometimes bloody fights against the same nobility and the same landed powers that held the movement in check in England.

A Basis for Present Understanding.—All this factual material about the development of the franchise in several nations is a necessary basis for any understanding of this weapon which men have tried to substitute for pride, force, and fraud. The fight has been bitter, continuous, and persistent through defeat and in spite of bloody penalty. The true value of the ballot in Alabama can be measured only with such facts in mind.

Carriers of the Torch.—Beginning in the earliest years of the Dark age, students and thinkers have lighted the torch that started fires and explosions in this campaign towards freedom. Thomas Aquinas, Marsiglio of Padua, William of Ockham, Nicholas of Cuco, Rousseau in France, the philosopher Locke in 1690, the Elder Pitt, Charles James Fox in 1781, the Younger Pitt in specially clear fashion—these and many other liberal leaders in all civilized nations have, in dark and dangerous times, lifted their voices in defense of what they called the "Rights of Man." Basic among these rights as stated by all such thinkers has been the right of the people to control their government. The device for such control has been and is a clear, just, and simple process of balloting.

The belief of these thinkers was throughout the Medieval Age stated in about these words, "Voluntary delegation of power by the nation is the ruler's only claim to the obedience of his subjects." This truth, preached by the small student and thinking group for two thousand years, is not yet clear to the citizens of many nations. The same thought was re-echoed in our Declaration of Independence, "All governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed." This is yet to be fully realized in America. Such truths, preached by the students, have been the yeast

Progressive America.—Progress has been disappointing at times but working in an excessively inert political mass for centuries.
always the movement toward reasonable and wide franchise has advanced. England has cleaned up her worst political faults and has a democratic government readily responsive to the public will. Her colonies have become much more liberal than the mother country. Australia led the way in an effective secret ballot. New Zealand gives a special 28 per cent weighting to rural ballots, recognizing the essentially rural nature of her economy, and reserves four seats in her legislative assembly for the natives of the island, the aborigines. The dominions have good voting provisions for sick or absentee citizens. The government pays all election costs. In Australia and the South African Union there is a serious race problem, the colored population being strictly disfranchised.

In the United States, many of the voting customs, qualifications, and sins have been inherited from European countries. Tax requirements, property qualifications, registration complexities, and election corruptions have descended to the present day. However, most of these conditions exist only in mild form, when comparison is made with the sources back in feudal days; and a reading of our history will make indisputable the steady progress towards a liberal franchise.

Since that first American election of delegates to the Virginia Assembly in 1619, the march towards wider and wiser franchise has been steady. Nine of the colonial constitutions framed between 1776 and 1780 called for the secret ballot. Oral voting, in spite of powerful support, has been discarded. No longer does Kentucky line up voters on opposite sides of a road and have a count by the Sheriff to decide the ballot, though this continued until 1890. Arkansas got rid of the oral ballot in 1846.

No longer is church membership required; no longer are Jews and Catholics disbarred; no longer are colored beans or grains of corn acceptable as ballots; most of the tax-paying qualifications are gone; women can vote along with men in nearly all elections; little of property-holding superiority survives; and some states keep the voters in immediate control of affairs by referendum, recall, and initiative.

America may need to take one lesson from the Belgians in providing for proportional representation in the legislative and electoral bodies, so that a respectable minority may be guaranteed some represenation along with the victorious majority. There is a great deal that we might learn from the little republic of Switzerland, which keeps control so promptly and exactly in the hands of the voters, and which has so nearly abolished campaign insanity and pressure-group government.

Switzerland.—Someone has said that Switzerland is so far behind the rest of the world politically that she is away out in front. Through modern systems of political machinery, the Swiss have placed the power back where it was in the cities of Ancient Greece, back in the hands of the Demos, the citizenry. Education of the best, compulsory and free for all as a precondition, nearly universal franchise, honest elections, referendum, recall, initiative, little abstention from voting, clearcut election statements and publicity, and little election excitement, have held the government under the will of trained, hard-hearded voters. The Swiss have recaptured in a modern style the core of original and almost pure democracy.

Today's Views.—What is the best thought of America today about the ballot, about this business of government control through citizen-voting? A careful study showing that our political thinkers and writers, our courts, and a large majority of our leaders do not agree with three of the general theories that past history has tested or has at times considered seriously. The first theory is the ancient one; namely, that citizenship and voting are inseparable. The second is that of Rousseau and other liberals; namely, that voting is a natural right like "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." Our thinkers of today reject both of these. In general they say that, if these things be true, not even an age limit or any intelligence qualification could be possible. Babies could vote, for they are citizens and possessors of all natural rights. The third theory rejected is that voting is in some way, through assessment or tax payment, connected with property holdings. This last-named has fallen into utter disrepute.

Our Corpus Juris states, "The possession of political rights is not essential to citizenship—minors may be citizens; citizen is not synonymous with elector or voter."

The U. S. Supreme Court says, "That fact that one is a subject or citizen determines nothing as to his rights as such. They vary in different localities ard according to circumstances. Citizenship has no necessary connection with the franchise of voting, eligibility to office, or indeed with any other rights, civil or political."

The Americana Encyclopedia, Volume 10, P. 71, makes this assertion,

"The elective franchise is a privilege rather than a natural right; its extension to any excluded class is a question of political expediency."

The Americana also states that, subject to the provisions of the 15th Amendment, "Each state possesses the supreme and exclusive power to regulate the right of suffrage and to define the qualifications of its voters, however unwise, unjust, or even tyrannical its regulations may be or seem to be in this regard."

The courts have ruled. "The rights of office and suffrage are political purely, and are denied by some or all the states to part of their population, who are still citizens."

Some political economists of our day think of voting rights not as a natural right, not as a citizenship element and not as a privilege; but rather they hold the franchise to be an "office", a position in and a part of the political government. They think of the right to vote as an office granted after compliance with certain conditions, proof of fixed qualifications, and then after approval by some agency acting under statute. Many of these thinkers doubt that a long list of voters or a multitude of voting occasions, taken as main dependencies, will guarantee good government. Opposing these majority opinions and general trends, there are still a certain number of citizens who hold to the extreme liberal view of Rousseau and others; namely, that voting is a natural right and that qualifications are iniquitous.

Note: For further current views, see below under "Arguments of Those Favoring Federal Repeal", page 38, and Personal and Editorial Comment, page 48.

Present-Day Qualifications.—A glance at present-day voting qualifications and requirements will reveal trends in American practice. Here they are for the year 1940 or later in the United States.

The minimum voting age is twenty-one in all states except Georgia, which recently reduced it to eighteen. United States citizenship is required in all. Residence in the state is required in all, the periods required being various; 6 months in eleven states, one year in thirty-two, two years in five. Alabama is among these. Residence in the county is a necessity in 36 states, the required period being 30 days in six states, 40 days in one, 60 days in five, 90 days in nine, 4 months in two, 5 months in one, 6 months in nine, and one year in three (Alabama here). Residence in a voting district is not required in seven states, 10 days residence is demanded in six, 20 days in two, 30 days in thirteen, 60 days in four, 3 months in four, including Alabama, 6 months in six, and one year in one, Mississippi, except for preachers.

Twelve states have some property test as a requirement; nineteen have some form of literacy test; six require payment of a poll tax; twenty-one have a permanent, state-wide registration of voters; seventeen have local registration only; nine have no law on registration; registration is periodic in seven states; and registration is forbidden in one state (Arkansas).

Disqualification.—Causes for disqualification vary widely. Indians not taxed are disqualified in six states; insane persons in thirty-eight; idiots in thirty-seven; incompetents in eight; immoral persons in five; illiterates in nineteen; paupers in twelve; inmates of institutions in ten. Soldiers and sailors on duty cannot gain residence in most states. Several forms of criminal conducts will disqualify: treason in sixteen states; felony in forty; bigamy in five (Alabama among these); duelling in eight; defalcation in seven; bribery in election matters in thirty-four (Alabama here); bribery of the legislature in four; perjury in seven (Alabama here); larceny in eight (Alabama here); forgery in five (Alabama not here); arson in four (Alabama here); embezzlement in six (Alabama here); and miscellaneous other offenses disqualify in nineteen. Alabama disqualifies for rape, adultery or moral turpitude of several types. With full enforcement, Alabama's voting list would be quite select.

The literacy test is most clearly applied in Washington, Oregon, California, Wyoming, Oklahoma, Louisiana, New York, Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticutt, North Carolina, and Delaware. Two states (Alabama and South Carolina) apply all three of the main restrictions—poll tax, literacy, and property. Eighteen states have none of these ancient requirements: Idaho, Colorado, New Mexico, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Ohio, West Virginia, Maryland, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey.

Absentee Votes.—All states except five provide some form of absentee voting. In South Carolina, the qualified elector may vote in absentia only in primary elections and only when sick. In New Hampshire, this privilege is available only for voting on presidental electors. In some states the elector must be at a minimum distance from his regular balloting place—the deadline being fifteen miles in Oregon, twenty in Utah, forty in New Mexico, and fifty in Ohio. Most states require that he be absent from his county, city, or precinct. Voting by proxy is allowed in Oklahoma. Physical inability to go to the polls is sufficient grounds for absentee balloting in twenty-four states. In nine states, prospective absentees may appear in person and vote before the regular time.

Conclusions.—This digest on voting is based mainly on a careful study of a history of the ballot published in two volumes in 1918 by Dr. Charles Seymour and Dr. Donald Paige Frary of Yale; it has been checked and supplemented by reference to standard text books and encyclopedias; and finally has been brought down to date by references to bulletins of state universities, of the Council of State Governments, of the Bureau of Municipal Research, and of the Civic Research Institute.

A few general conclusions seem possible:

1. For more than five hundred years, there has been in all civilized nations a growing demand for a liberal franchise.

2. The property test and any tax qualification for voting rights are increasingly unpopular; and, even where these are legally imposed, enforcement is strict in only a few states.

3. Voting is not recognized by political economists as a natural right or as a necessary adjunct of citizenship. The economists' argument on this point appears unanswerable.

4. Secret balloting is a necessity for democracy and should be hindered by no device.

5. The absentee ballot is generally approved and works successfully in most states.

6. Abstention from voting is a serious problem. Penalties are applied in some states.

7. Qualifications of many types are set by various states; and disqualifications are also numerous and varied. Sovereign states differ mainly as to the tests applied and not so much as to their authority to require specific qualifications.

8. The qualification which appears reasonable and inescapable is an educational test. Voters should be proved competent. The New York law which prescribes a test on "ability to read and write English," under a testing process handled by the state school system has proved satisfactory and has been upheld in the courts. A knowledge of history and civics might well be added to the English requirement.

9. Any kind of test has elements of danger. It must be handled by non-political officers and must be reasonable and fair. History proves the danger of qualifications handled by government officials directly interested in elections. Registration should follow the test, should be simple and readily available.

10. Ballots should be simple and short. Referendums should be separated from party ballots. Fewer officials should be elected and more should be appointed by executive officers or boards. Only this can avoid confusion in the minds of the voters.

11. The effort to keep the ballot "clean" needs constant emphasis.

12. There is no truly democratic government until fair and reasonable qualifications are used in an honest manner to select the competent electors and until the system applies alike to all citizens. The road to participation in government must be open just as the road "to the pursuit of happiness." Voting and happiness may not come to every citizen; but both should belong to those who qualify under an honest plan with no traps unfairly set.

13. Many past wars have resulted from a lack of popular control of government. George the Third, in bringing on the American Revolution, does not seem to have represented the best English thinking of his day or even the will of the commoners. Adolf Hitler and Benito Mussolini seized control in their countries with no free expression of popular choice through the ballot. The military clique of Japan directed their nation into war under a government that stifles the public will. For safty and reasonable peace, the officials in every nation must be actual representatives of the people.

14. Each and every war has been followed by a resurgent demand for wider suffrage and more complete popular control. The present world war, with hundreds of millions of people involved, will surely bring the greatest outcry and action for a wise and complete voting system that history has yet known. Every state should plan wisely to meet this need.

NOTE: For the historical background of the use of the poll tax as a requirement for voting, see article by H. Clarence Nixon entitled "Influences of the Past", page 36.

REGISTRATION AND VOTING PROCEDURE INCLUDING SURVEY OF THE BALLOT AND ABSENTEE VOTING

Joseph M. Ray, University

There has been much agitation in recent months, particularly since the senatorial campaign between Lister Hill and Jim Simpson, for reforms of various kinds in registration and voting procedure in Alabama. These problems have been aggravated by the nationwide concern over the existence of the poll tax in this and other states and by the absence from their home communities of many persons in the armed services and in war work. Not a little of the dissatisfaction with voting procedures (and this is especially true with those who currently favor the abolition of absentee voting) has arisen from the dissatisfaction of those persons who are opposed to the liberalism which has characterized the National Administration and of those who supported the unsuccessful campaign for Senator Simpson. Regardless of motives, however, the fact remains that a great deal of concern is currently being expressed regarding the inadequacies of Alabama's present registration and voting procedures.

It is my view that nearly all of the points at which criticism has been directed led, in the final analysis, to the inadequacies of our system of registration. It shall be my purpose, therefore, to take up in order the subjects of the secret ballot, voting procedure, the absentee ballot, poll tax payment, and registration itself to show that most of our evils can be cured through the establishment and careful financing of a more modern system of registration.

Secret Ballot.—We all know, of course, that Alabama does not have a secret ballot. The voter in Alabama casts a traceable ballot. The ballot is numbered and his name is associated on the list with that number. Most of the people connected with county politics will insist that election contests necessarily require a device whereby the individual ballot can be traced to the person who cast it.

It might be suggested at the outset that in the places where voting machines are used we have already surrendered whatever advantage accrues to the traceable ballot. In those counties and precincts in which the printed ballot is used, the traceable ballot is still in use.

The crux of the issue, as was indicated above, is a necessity which may later arise of withdrawing and discarding a fraudulent ballot; the responsibility, therefore, is upon us to preclude the possibility of the casting of a vote by a person not duty qualified. If a person is duly qualified to vote, and that fact can be authoritatively established before he is handed a ballot, the urgency of the necessity of tracing his individual ballot is obviated. Here then, we reach the conclusion that effective registration procedure is the key to our dilemma.

Voting Procedure.—Voting procedure in general is much the same in all jurisdictions. The question of identifying the voter before he is given the ballot is the heart of the process. A system of reference cards bearing the signature of the voter might be maintained in the voting place. Thus the individual voter could be required to identify himself by means of his signature before the ballot is issued. Here again, the resolution of our dilemma entails the establishment of a more effective system of registration.

The Absentee Ballot.—As was suggested at the outset, much of the criticism of absentee balloting in Alabama has derived from the disappointed supporters of Senator Simpson and from anti-New Dealers in general. They would resolve the issue by the complete abolition of absentee voting except in the cases of men and women in the armed forces. There seems little doubt that many counties in the state have seen gross violations of the absentee ballot regulations. To abolish absentee voting, however, would clearly illustrate the case of a remedy with consequences more rigorous than the disease which it is designed to cure.

Without taking sides, either for or against the people who are dissatisfied with the results of the last senatorial race, we must out of necessity take issue with their program to abolish absentee voting. Not only do men and women in the armed services need to vote; other persons, such as traveling salesmen, railroad men, persons in the government service who are away from their homes in Washington and elsewhere, and students in college, should have the suffrage in Alabama. Not the least consideration in this connection is that Alabama has too few competent voters at best, and the abolition of absentee voting would disfranchise some of the best qualified voters in our state.

The issue here, as in the two points previously discussed, leads us to the conclusion that most of the abuses in the casting of absentee ballots could be resolved if a fool-proof, dependable system of registration could be established. One reform could be the requirement that the voter present himself at the Probate Judge's Office some time within a thirty day period prior to the election. He would tender his signature in exchange for a ballot, which he would vote and have notarized on the spot. If those who would abolish the system entirely were still concerned lest the ballots themselves be tampered with prior to the official tabulation, the law could require that all absentee ballots be mailed immediately after they were cast to the Office of the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State could then on election day tabulate the votes for each county and communicate the absentee vote tabulation to the election officials of each county.

The question of the identity of any person seeking to cast an absentee ballot appears to be the crux of the problem. This brings us again to the issue of an adequate system of registration.

Poll Tax Payment.—The payment of poll tax, as we all know, is a prerequisite for the placing of the name of an individual on the voter's list. We are not here concerned with the efficacy of the poll tax as such. In its administration, however, the process of including on the voter's list only the names of those persons who have paid their poll taxes is fairly simple. Irregularities can occur only in the case of war veterans and persons over forty-five, who are exempted from poll tax payment. The opportunity for irregular and illegal practice, both in connection with absentee and regular ballot, involves in the main these exempted persons. Here again, we come to the need of a system of registration that will be both accurate and dependable, a system wherein the list is kept permanently up to date.

Registration.—The weaknesses of our present system of registration would appear to me to derive in no sense from maladministration or bad faith on the part of boards of registration. The fact is, rather, that part-time boards have performed in spasmodic fashion a function that should be exercised continuously by administrative officials fully equipped to discharge the job at hand. We in Alabama are too prone to resign complex technical jobs to part-time officials whose only qualification is that they know their way around in county politics. If the heart of our problem is registration, then we should have a well-devised system of registration.

Part of this issue, if not the very heart of it, is the matter of finance. No function of government can be performed adequately unless sufficient funds are made available for the purpose.

Plan Needed in Alabama.—We may conclude, therefore, that what Alabama needs at the very core of the whole electoral process is, first, a system of registration that can accurately determine before the time for balloting the names of persons who are qualified to vote, and second, a device for identifying the individual voter at the time of voting.

The first consideration entails a reform that has been instituted in many parts of the country, namely, a system of permanent registration. Periodical purgings of the voter's list are too slip-shod. We need regularly constituted registration officials working constantly at their job, studying death notices and newspaper clippings, using the telephone, and canvassing the voters to keep up with the population and to maintain the voter's list. The second consideration would involve a task for the individual voter, namely, the recording of his signature. Then when he appears in the Probate Judge's Office for his absentee ballot or at the voting place for his regular ballot he could be identified, if not otherwise, by his signature. Poll tax payment, if the poll tax is continued, could be implemented in the preparation of the voting list for a given election.

A system of permanent registration would cost money, to be sure. The cost, however, would not be prohibitive. A study of this problem by Joseph P. Harris published in 1929 shows that the cost in various cities in the United States maintaining a system of permanent registration ranged from $.13 to $.84 per registered voter. It is my considered opinion that the overall cost of our present system of registration is far in excess of the minimum figure listed here.

We may conclude, therefore, that the questions of the secret ballot, voting procedure in general, the absentee ballot, and the possible irregularities involving persons exempted from poll tax payment all narrow down basically to defects in registration and that the monkey is definitely on our backs in Alabama to make registration procedures more effective.

THE POLL TAX SHOULD BE REPEALED

Harry M. Ayers,* Anniston

As is probably known by most of you, the present franchise law of Alabama was framed at the Constitutional Convention of 1901 and adopted by the people in a special election called for the purpose of ratification or rejection during the same year. There were two prime objectives motivating those who assumed the leadership in this Convention; the first being to disfranchise the Negro and the second being to enact such laws as would protect corporate property in the State. As is well known, Alabama and other states were very much under the control of the railroads at that time and those utilities were particularly well represented in the Convention.

Unquestionably there was some justification for a restriction on voting, due to the fact that the ballot had been corrupted by the wholesale purchase of votes in several elections preceding the 1901 Convention. However, in their zeal to deprive Negroes, without respect to their character or intelligence, of their citizenship those in charge of the Convention also succeeded in depriving a large number of white persons at the same time, and that deprivation has grown progressively with the passing of the years.

In an effort to make a distinction between the whites and the Negroes, a so-called "grandfather clause" was made a part of the franchise law. This device was conceived for the purpose of circumventing the 15th Amendment. Exemption from property owning, tax paying or educational requirements in state suffrage laws was granted to those who had the right to vote on January 1, 1867, and to their lineal descendents. Since Negroes in the South could not vote at the time, they were excluded from the privilege granted to impoverished and illiterate whites. According to the Dictionary of American History, this clause was adopted in South Carolina in 1895; Louisiana, 1898; North Carolina, 1900; Alabama, 1901; Virgina, 1902; and Oklahoma, 1910; but the clause was declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court as enforced in several of the States in 1915.

Recognizing that this provision, together with the $1.50 cumulative poll tax, would have the effect of disfrancising a large number of white persons, it was vigorously opposed at the time the Constitution was submitted in Alabama by persons like ex-Governors Johnston, Jones and Oates, former Senator Frank S. White, H. S. Dent, George P. Harrison and Senator John T. Morgan.

Requirements For Voting.—As is fairly well known, the $1.50 poll tax in Alabama extends from the age of 21 to 45 and shall be paid on October 1st of each year and become deliquent as of February 1st of the year following, the tax collector having no authority to collect poll taxes after the first day of February and before the first day of the next October.

* Mr. Ayers could not attend, but submitted this statement to be read.

Veterans of World War I and II and of the Spanish-American War have been exempted from payment of the tax, as are persons permanently disabled whose taxable property does not exceed $500.

In addition to payment of the poll tax, all voters in Alabama must have registered and once registered their registration is final except when moving from one state or county to another. In order to register, a person must have resided in this State two years, in the county one year and in the precinct three months. He must also be able to read and write any part of the Federal Constitution in the English language and must have been in some lawful employment during the greater part of the year previous to his registration, or he must own forty acres of land, or real estate or personal property valued at at least $300. In addition, any person who has been guilty of such offenses as burglary, perjury, false pretenses, wife beating, bigamy, adultery, vagrancy, receiving stolen property, and selling or offering his vote for sale would be debarred from voting in the State.

Booker T. Washington Petition.—When the Convention was in session, Booker T. Washington and a committee of other educated Negroes addressed a petition to the Convention in which they warned.

> "Already alarm is beginning to spread among them (the Negroes) and their fears are being worked on by emigration agents and exodus associations who are telling them that under the new Constitution the Negro's citizenship will be taken from him and his schools will soon be virtually blotted out . . . The Negro youth must have some incentive for right and useful living held out to him. Let the Negro youth feel that no matter how useful or intelligent he makes himself there is no hope of reward held out for him, and there is danger that he will become a beast reveling in crime, and a band of death about the neck of the State."

This prediction has been verified to a marked extent during the last fifty years. For instance, the Negro population of Detroit increased from around 40,000 in 1920 to 149,000 in 1940; of Cleveland, from 34,000 to 84,000; of New York, from 152,000 to 458,000; of St. Louis, from 69,000 to 108,000. Stated differently, by 1930 that Northern increase amounted to some 2.4 millions, a loss to the South that amounted to nearly two millions, which is more than 20 percent of the South's Negro population and more than five percent of its total population at that time. Nor does this take into consideration the children of many of those Negroes who would have remained in the South. Neither does it take into consideration the vast numbers of good Negroes who have emigrated from the South to congested war work centers during the last few years, the effect of which has been to bring about a revolutionary situation which respect to domestic servants in the South.

The effect of this tide of emigration away from the South has been felt particularly in the agricultural sections of the South, especially in those states where Cotton has been King. It has become especially important, too, in view of the fact that many of our best Negroes are among those who are moving to other sections of the country, while the ignorant and illiterate have remained to become a burden on society as predicted by Booker Washington, as a result of disease and criminalty, which usually stem from illiteracy.

But the effect of the restrictive election laws has been by no means confined to the Negroes. Especially during the dark days of the depression, many good citizens in the State had to make a decision as to whether they should spend $1.50, or $3.00 in the case of a man and wife, or more when the tax had accumulated or else buy food and clothing for the family. The decision was not hard to make, because as Alexander Hamilton warned many years ago, people in distressful circumstances, no matter how free they may be, will frequently barter their freedom for security. This decision, however, was not arrived at by any means by the more indigent classes of our population. Many women, for instance, if called upon to decide whether or not they would buy a new pair of hose or purchase the right to vote, decide in favor of the hose.

As a consequence, in the last presidential election less than twenty per cent of the adult persons in Alabama exercised their right of franchise. Furthermore, with the diminishing of the ballot it has been found easier, year by year, for corporations or corrupt political machines to control elections, and at the same time it has been found exceedingly difficult to gain a favorable vote for many measures that would be in the interest of the less privileged classes of the Commonwealth. Especially needed at this time is an amendment to the Constitution that would allow local units of government to vote upon themselves taxes for educational purposes. Dues to these and many other reasons, the more enlightened citizens of the State are coming to the conclusion that Alabama's voting laws must be changed and that a new Constitution should be submitted to the people as soon as the boys have returned from the wars. If this is not done, it will become more difficult from year to year to keep the Federal Government from forcing such reforms upon the sovereign states.

To abolish the poll tax does not imply by any means that the floodgates would be opened to every Tom, Dick and Harry who might want to vote in Alabama elections. Other states are protecting their ballot by a literacy test and in no state where the poll tax has been abolished has an election been taken over by Negroes, as is seemingly feared by some of the poll tax advocates in Alabama.

On the other hand, it is reliably stated wherever the poll tax has been abolished, state and local government has been improved. The tax has been repealed in North Carolina, Louisiana, Kentucky, Florida and Georgia and was maintained in Tennessee after it had been voted out by the Legislature only because of the death of one member of the Supreme Court. Recently in that state there has been a district court that ruled the tax unconstitutional and in South Carolina and Virginia definite steps have been taken toward repealing the poll tax laws. The tax unquestionably would be defeated if submitted to popular vote in this State and it is sincerely to be hoped that favorable action will be taken by the Legislature when it convenes in May.

EFFECT OF THE CUMULATIVE FEATURE OF THE POLL TAX IN JEFFERSON COUNTY

Mrs. Harvey M. Emerson, Birmingham

In only one of our 49 states could the following headline appear in a newspaper and be true: "Vote Privilege Cost $36.00 for 93 in County."* The seven poll tax states charged the following minimum and maximum for voters:

	Amount of rate	Maximum Legal Charges	Due Date
South Carolina	$1.00	$1.00	60 days before election
Arkansas	1.00	2.00	October 1
Tennessee	1.00	2.58	February 1
Texas	1.50	1.75	6 months before election
Virginia	1.50	5.08	6 months before election
Alabama	1.50	36.00	February 1
Mississippi	2.00	6.00	30 days before election

In only three states the tax is cumulative for voters; Mississippi, for two years preceding an election; Virginia, three; and Alabama for the entire period of liability from age 21 to 45, or for 24 years.

During the four month period the poll tax is received in Alabama, October 1 to February 1, Tax Collector J. W. Hamilton took in this last time from Jefferson County registered voters:

15,772 paid $1.50 for 1 year.	30 paid $30.00 for 20 years.
946 paid $3.00 for 2 years.	32 paid $31.50 for 21 years.
434 paid $4.50 for 3 years.	29 paid $33.00 for 22 years.
161 paid $7.50 for 5 years.	26 paid $34.50 for 23 years.

93 paid $36.00 for 24 years, the maximum.

So for 1945 we have 18,758 voters who have paid poll taxes. However, the number of qualified voters for Jefferson County is around 60,000, showing that just about one-third of those who vote must pay poll taxes; the others are exempt. The adult population for Jefferson County is 284,359. Only 32.572 votes were cast during our 1944 May Primary—18,006 for Senator Hill and 14,566 for Senator Simpson—about 12 percent of those who should be voting.

By February 1 of this year, our tax collector had taken in only $55,-356.00 in poll taxes. If all of our adults in Jefferson had paid the $1.50 yearly poll tax, we would have had $426,438.50. Since two-thirds of the voters are exempt and no effort is made to collect poll taxes, we can assume that the revenue derived from poll taxes is of little consequence.

Voting in Homewood.—I live in the little city of Homewood, Alabama, which is a "relatively new, fast growing residential section of the Birmingham metropolitan district, having a population with better education, better homes, and better jobs than the average in the district", to quote from a recent survey called "Postwar Planning" which was made at the request of our Mayor and City Council under the direction of Dr. Roscoe C. Martin, Director of the Bureau of Public Administration, University of Alabama.

* From Birmingham Post, February 27, 1945

 Table from page 15, "The Poll Tax" by Eleanor Bontecou, published in 1942 by the American Association of University Women, Washington D. C.

Of a total population of 7,397 (in 1940), 4,819 were of voting age; but in 1944 only 1,569 were registered. On my particular street in 13 houses, only three of which are rented, live 29 adults, 19 women and 14 men. Nine of the men vote and six of the women. With the exception of the couple still in their thirties, the other 13 voters are either so near 45 years of age that they will be able to finish out their 24 years of poll taxes before the next recession, or they are already exempt from the payment of poll taxes, having passed their 45th birthday.

Why My Other 14 Neighbors, Nine Women and Five Men Don't Vote

Case 1.—A recently discharged Marine sergeant—just hasn't found time to go to the Court House and re-register which will excuse him from further poll tax payments. His wife said: "Why don't I vote? I got married instead. I was looking forward to voting too as my father always helps at the polls during elections. But I am now 29 and owe for eight years; $12.00 would buy me a spring outfit, if I had the $12.00."

Case 2.—The new neighbors across the way are grandparents. The husband is in good standing as to his poll tax payments. However, he hadn't lived the required three months in the 25th precinct so couldn't vote in the Homewood City elections September 18. His wife said, "Oh, yes, I am registered and interested in voting. In fact, I have been down recently to pay up my back poll taxes which come to about $14.00 but I got there at the wrong time. I am ashamed to admit it but I became delinquent when we moved to Georgia some years ago. Then, too, my husband votes Republican and I am a Democrat, so usually I kill his vote."

Case 3.—On our left live a couple in their middle thirties. I figured the husband must owe about $21.00 in back poll taxes, the wife $19.50. The wife told me last fall, "I have about decided on some drapery material for the living room and dining room. The curtains would cost about $40.00. French says if I will wait on the drapes he will take that money and pay our poll taxes, but I don't know." To date they haven't the new curtains, maybe the poll taxes are paid.

Case 4.—Our neighbors from New Orleans have lived in Alabama six years now. The husband travels for a railroad. The wife said, "You live here two years and you begin to be interested in the local set-up and you want to vote, but owe $4.50 to start with. The railroad men, most of them, say, 'I may be transferred tomorrow,' so they don't register. It would take $9.00 a piece for us to vote in Alabama now." They voted in Louisiana and helped rid that state of Huey Long. They are interested in a really secret ballot, which we do not have in Alabama except where voting machines are used.

Two of our non-voting wives married to husbands who vote said: (Case 1) "I came to Alabama from Tennessee as an orphan, finished high school, and went to work. I kept thinking I would register but never did, then I married. Now I owe poll taxes for years and years. Can a person vote after they reach 45?" Answer, "Yes, provided you pay poll taxes for 24 years—$36.00" Case 2—"I moved to Alabama in 1937 from North Carolina where I voted. Fred registered and votes here. I owe for eight years and I keep thinking I will go down and pay my back poll taxes so I can vote. When can I register?"

In Our PTA, the Executive Board is made up of six elected officers, 25 appointed committee chairmen and a parliamentarian making a total of 32 women. Checking these names against the published voters list of last May, we find that 12 are registered voters, 20 are not on the list, including the president and the secretary. In talking to the secretary she told me, "The fact that neither Frank nor I vote is a source of great embarrassment to us, especially as we are related to important persons in the Democratic Party and in politics. We have lived in Birmingham ten years now and it would take $30.00 for the two of us to pay up our back poll taxes. The depression and a large number of doctor and dentist bills are the reasons they have not been paid. Each year Frank says, 'I hope I can pay our poll taxes this year.'"

My next phone call was to a young woman on our PTA Board whose name appears on the voters list but we could not find her husband's. She said, "My husband travels all the time; often he purchases his automobile tag in another part of the State. He isn't interested in voting and he is now 41 and would owe 20 years back taxes or $30.00. I came from Tennessee where you pay the $2.00 the year you vote, $1.00 for the state and $1.00 for the county. If you don't vote your taxes are not held against you and allowed to accumulate. I paid about ten dollars when I registered in Alabama. I have such strong convictions—one of them complete abolition of the poll tax—I reached the point where I felt I must be a voter and not just a talker."

In checking the six officers-elect of our PTA, I discovered two voters and four non-voters. One of the voters is the Vice-President in charge of Programs. She said, "I haven't thought much about the poll tax. It doesn't worry me and never has. As I was living with my uncle and aunt when I was 21, my uncle paid my poll tax the first year. The second year I was married and my husband paid them and has every year since." In contrast, a neighbor on the next block said, "Jimmie, as a veteran of the last war, doesn't have to bother about the poll tax. It slips up on me but I manage never to get more than a year or so behind." She is the mother of five children, one still pre-school. She went on, "I am for complete abolition. When our colored people get to the point they are interested in voting, they can help with the elections too. If Georgia can do without the poll tax, so can we." She wasn't on last May's voters list, but she now has her poll tax receipt for taxes paid up-to-date. She is President of a literary club of 25 members. Last Friday she asked them how many were voters; 14 said they were, nine said they were not, and two were absent. She was distressed but I told her the voting average of her group was quite high.

One of my friends, a newspaper man, has not paid his poll taxes since Hoover was elected President. He now owes $25.00. During the depression he not only cared for his wife and two babies, but also for relatives on both sides.

So much for how the cumulative poll tax affects my crowd. Even with our "better education, better homes, and better jobs" we have a hard time paying our poll taxes. Only 1065 of us went to the polls on September 18, one of our most vigorously campaigned city elections. How much harder it must be for those about whom Miss Frances Callen wrote, "The average annual income in poll tax states is less than $300, that of tenant farmers but $73 in cash money. Poll taxes from $1 to $2 represent a substantial amount especially so in Alabama where arrears of back poll taxes may run as high as $36."*

Results of AAUW Questionnaire.—The results of a questionnaire submitted without comment to members of the Birmingham Branch of the Association of University Women at their regular meeting April 17, were as follows:

For abolition of the poll tax as a prerequisite to voting: For, 64; against, 23; undecided, 2; not checked, 7; blank questionnaires, 16. Of the 64 voting for abolition, 47 were voters—29 poll tax payers and 17 exempt, and 17 were non-voters. Of the 23 against abolition, 19 were voters—13 poll tax payers and 6 exempt, and 4 non-voters. Of the 96 answering the questionnaires, 72 were voters—45 poll tax payers and 23 exempt, whereas 24 were non-voters.

Reasons given by 24 for not voting in Alabama, all of whom stated they were interested in voting: Six had not lived in the State the required two years; five were behind in poll-tax payments; five were not 21 years old; four had never registered; one was a visitor in the State; one objected to the absence of a secret ballot; two gave no reasons.

A former president of the Birmingham Branch gave her reasons for abolition: "1. I think value of poll tax too insignificant in comparison to harm or keeping down number of voters. 2. Poverty of people in state, especially many farmers. 3. I do not fear the negro vote, since N. C. has furnished us an example of the success of a Southern State without poll tax." Another wrote: "The poll tax is a political device by which the vote can be controlled. This practice is undemocratic, if it is used to control the Negro vote, it is time we should educate the negro how to vote — and not deny him this right" Another: "Feel poll tax is constitutionally wrong. Consider myself intelligent—average education—could financially afford payment of back poll taxes, but my convictions are against such taxes. Am not in sympathy with its origin and feel that it is obsolete now. The money alone keeps lots of intelligent white people and some intelligent negroes from the highest privilege of citizenship."

Several mentioned the effects of the cumulative features of our poll tax on the voting of women: "I am acquainted with several women who should vote but do not because of the cumulative feature of the poll tax. It seems to me an unfair requisite for voting." "Voting makes better citizenship. Having to pay back poll tax keeps many woman from voting." "It is most undemocratic for a citizen to have to pay for the duty and privilege of voting. Furthermore, the poll tax keeps many intelligent women from voting because of the accumulated fees. If we are spilling American blood to get democracy for the other nations, why should we be undemocratic at home?"

A woman lawyer wrote: "There is something wrong when only about 17 per cent of the Alabama citizens over 21 vote." Another voter put on her paper: "I don't believe a person should have to pay to vote in a free country."

Among those who wished to retain the poll tax: "I am not in favor of having to pay poll tax and being unable to vote for two years. But I feel that we must have some method of keeping the ignorant and uneducated, both black and white, from voting. There are some counties in Alabama where the negro would control the election if he could vote. Therefore I am opposed to abolition of poll tax." Several stressed the fact that the poll tax goes to schools: "Schools need every penny they can get and $1.50 per year does not prevent reliable persons from voting." "As a democratic principle, I think the poll tax should be abolished but not before some measure has been taken in Alabama to replace the amount in the educational fund."* "I do not consider $1.50 per year an amount prohibitive to voting. The money derived goes to our schools. Eventually a strict literacy test may be substituted as a prerequisite for voting."

Several, while not favoring abolition, would be willing to eliminate part of the cumulative feature. Another former president of the Birmingham Branch wrote: "With the payment of two or three years back taxes I would be willing to have delinquent tax payers vote. It is because of the forces that are pushing the abolition of poll tax that I chiefly object."

A teacher in one of our local colleges wrote on her questionnaire,

* Poll taxes for Jefferson County for 10/1/43 to 2/1/44—$$62,059.50
Total spent on 5 school systems in County 1943-44—$5,569,310.00

"People who are intelligent enough to vote make enough money to pay poll tax. Too many illiterate votes would be bought." Agreeing with her is the national second vice-president of the American Association of University Women who told me in Montgomery in the fall of 1942 at a board meeting of the Alabama Division that any woman could earn or raise $1.50 if she really wanted to vote.

Yes, $1.50 is only the "price of 30 soft drinks, the cost of 10 packages of cigarettes, the price of 5 admissions to a moving picture show, less than the cost of a good necktie, less than the cost of one 'book of the month' "*; but $1.50 will buy 14 loaves of bread including sales tax with seven cents left over, buy 15 quarts of milk (Montgomery prices), pay for a school child's lunches for two weeks, cotton material for a house dress, postage on 18 airmail letters to a boy fighting overseas. With $36.00 one can purchase a suit of clothes or a winter coat, pay one semester's tuition at Miles Memorial College in Birmingham, the dentist bills for one year for a family of four. $1.50 and $36.00 will pay for a $50.00 war bond. Yes, $1.50 or $36.00, or any amount in between for something priceless!

* Judge Walter B. Jones addressing the survivors of the 1901 Alabama Constitutional Convention, 10/29/42, Jefferson Davis Hotel, Montgomery.

In 41 of our 48 states, citizens pay nothing for the right of the franchise. Yet all the gold hidden in the salt mines of Germany could not buy the vote for some of our fellow men across the Atlantic. The very best answer favoring abolition of the poll tax was written by a young woman still too young to vote in Alabama, "Poll tax is contrary to democratic ideals. It is in opposition to that part of the Constitution which guarantees the franchise to every citizen of the United States. We are defeating the very thing for which we fight when we put a 'price' on democracy—and voting is the very essence of democracy."

Not quite 100 years ago a small group of women resolved "that it is the duty of the women of the country to secure to themselves the sacred right of the franchise." * The women of Alabama must help abolish the poll tax as prerequisite for voting if many of us are to vote.

NOTES ON QUALIFICATIONS FOR VOTING IN ALABAMA

Mrs. L. S. Evins, Birmingham

In order to vote a person:

Must be 21 years of age for every state (except 18 for Georgia).

Must be a citizen, and not have been convicted of certain crimes.

Must register.

Residence.—Must have been a resident for two years.

Two years in state, one year in county, three months in precinct.

Thirty-two states have a one year residence requirement.

Alabama's residence requirement is too long. War workers, tenant farmers, citizens leaving the state for a little while, or coming back must wait two years to vote. It is a horse-and-buggy rule. With daily papers and radio, information travels faster than in 1901.

Property. A person to vote must own at least $300 worth of property; personal property may be included. The majority are asked no questions about property. Registrar asks property requirements of those he desires to eliminate. There should be no property requirements. Citizenship should not be determined by material possessions.

Education. Must be able to read or write.

Poll tax. $1.50 per year cumulative between 21 and 45 years.

Seven states have a poll tax, Georgia recently repealed her poll tax. The poll tax was levied in Alabama in 1901 to prevent the negro from voting. It has proved a boomerang, disfranchising more whites than blacks. The tax is undemocratic and makes Alabama a state ruled by privilege—those who can afford to pay. Men and women with small incomes and especially mothers with little children whose needs are many and expensive find the poll tax hard to pay. In the 1944 presidential election, 19 percent voted in poll tax states, other states 60 percent voted. All citizens should have equal civic and political rights. The poll tax brings about inequalities.

* Victory—How the Women Won It—published by the National American Woman Suffrage Association—p. 28.

Prejudice and fear keeps the poll tax: (1) opposition to negro vote. (2) fear of radical labor leaders.

Every change in government brings problems to be solved. The negro vote now is controlled by Boards of Registrars. Possibly the correct control should be through higher educational requirements. Much of the danger of radical labor leadership could be relieved through a really secret ballot.

Louisiana, Florida, North Carolina have no poll tax. No particular trouble has arisen as a result of abolishing the tax, but the number of voters has risen.

There are those who insist that since the poll tax goes to schools it should continue to be levied. All poll tax money collected in Alabama in a year wouldn't keep the schools open but two days.

A person who votes is a better citizen. He assumes his share of responsibility, is more interested in law and order. He is more loyal to the government which he helps to create. Instead of barriers to prevent voters, a chance to vote should be within every citizen's easy reach.

THE FRANCHISE SHOULD BE BROADENED

Charles N. Feidelson, Birmingham

I have been asked to discuss the cumulative feature of the poll tax. But in view of the fact that it has already been dealt with, I prefer to take up the larger issue. Since it would involve as much trouble to get rid of the cumulative feature as to get rid of the parent evil, it seems to me that we should take the more sweeping approach—that we should aim at eliminating the system of requiring the payment of a tax as a condition precedent to voting. It is the poll tax in its entirety which is obnoxious to all who know how it got into the constitution and what it has brought about in our political life.

We are led to believe that it was originally aimed at establishing "White Supremacy", but even at the very outset reactionary forces were using this as a screen for their suppression of the remains of the Populist movement in this state. The men who were running the constitutional convention had had enough of agrarian revolt. They wanted to make sure that they would not be subjected again to the fright they had had when the discontented farmers rose in their wrath. And to the extent that they have succeeded in throttling progressivism in Alabama, in keeping down the number of voters to make machine domination easy, they have found in the poll tax a powerful weapon.

Whatever the reasons for imposing the poll tax on the state, it is now plain that these reasons are no longer valid. It is now plain that if "White Supremacy" hinges on this undemocratic device, we are leaning on a broken reed. The federal government will soon get rid of the poll tax if we don't anticipate that exercise of authority. It is now plain that the only people who wish to retain the poll tax are the politicians and office-holders who do not relish the idea of asking preferment from a truly representative electorate.

If we want to keep the ballot pure and undefiled, we must work for fair and fairly administered registration laws in that behalf. But even that is not likely to get us very far, so long as we have a one-party system. I am a good Democrat but I look forward to the day when two respectable parties can fight it out in Alabama. Until that time comes, we will be plagued by the factionalism which is a perfect climate for reactionism and corruption.

Let's do away with the poll tax, let's do away with other discriminatory laws directing at keeping the Negro in his place. Let's have registration laws which can be applied without making a mockery of fair play and democracy. Let's do everything in our power to abolish the shadow under which Southern whites move and have their being. Let's wipe out a double standard which divides us against ourselves. Let's have a "White Supremacy" dependent on the white men's superiority and not on doing violence to the rights and hopes of the Negro.

THE CUMULATIVE POLL TAX IN ALABAMA

Carey E. Haigler, Birmingham

The cumulative poll tax in Alabama has, like a cancer, gnawed at the very life of our democracy. Adopted in 1901 ostensibly for the purpose of preserving "White Supremacy" but actually to restrict the right of franchise to a select minority, it has actually deprived thousands of our white citizens of the opportunity of voting.

The immediate reduction in votes cast after the adoption of the poll tax in Alabama amounted to thirty-four percent. Since then the number of people voting has steadily declined.

The men and women within each state who are kept from voting suffer first and most from the poll tax. Their elected officers know that they owe their election to a small proportion of the people, and they are more likely to make laws for the benefit of minority groups.

The now ailing Senator Carter Glass of Virginia made one of his characteristic speeches in the Constitutional Convention of 1901 in his state in which he said, "The chief purpose of this Convention is to amend the suffrage clause of the existing Constitution. It does not require much prescience to foretell that the alterations which we shall make will not apply to all persons and classes without distinction. We were sent here to make distinctions. We expect to make distinctions. We will make distinctions." The Chairman of the Alabama Convention of 1901 was frank to admit that one of the purposes of the poll tax was to eliminate the

One of the silliest arguments heard in favor of retaining the poll tax is that it prevents the Negro from voting. I say to you that thousands of Negroes will go without food, if necessary, to pay their poll tax if payment of the tax was the only requirement to voting. The registration laws of Alabama constitute the real barrier for Negro voters.

Another favorite argument of the poll taxers is the oft quoted "revenue derived from the poll tax goes to education". The amount of poll tax paid at the close of the books on February 1, 1940, with one of the fullest registrations Alabama ever had, was probably less than three hundred thousand dollars, or about enough to run the schools for two days. Of far greater importance to education are the representatives in the Legislature, who are elected by less than one-fifth of the possible voters of Alabama.

Revenue derived from the poll tax will be less than ever since the people of Alabama have by referendum vote overwhelmingly exempted veterans of all wars of the United States from the payment of the tax. That in my humble opinion was indicative of the attitude of even the small minority group who now enjoy the right of franchise and you can readily imagine what the thoughts of those who are deprived of this right would be.

The Chairman of the State Democratic Executive Committee in public statements, both oral and written, has often referred to the riff-raff of Alabama who would be permitted to vote if restrictions such as the poll tax were eliminated. It is hard for me to imagine any substantial group of Americans as riff-raff and the Chairman's remarks are an insult to those of our people who have been victims of our economic set-up in the South.

Another stock argument of the poll taxers is directed against "outside agitators" and "pressure from without". Some of the same people in our state government who are so apt to rant and rave over the outsiders are the same people who so earnestly sat and listened to "Eddie" Rickenbacker and Lee O'Daniel when they addressed joint sessions of the Alabama Legislature and then these same gentlemen subserviently enacted the Bradford anti-labor law. As long as Alabama appears ridiculous in the eyes of the outside world, just as long as we permit discriminatory laws to remain on our statute books, just so long we may expect to be the targets of barbed criticism from peoples of other states and nations, even though they are, so to speak, busily engaged in "removing the mote from their neighbor's eyes instead of the beam from their own".

West Virginia, Kentucky, North Carolina, Louisiana, Florida, and now Georgia have taken their rightful place in this great republic whose Constitution states emphatically, "that no state can pass any laws abridging the rights of its citizens granted under the Federal Constitution". Another great document, the Declaration of Independence, makes reference to the fact that every just government derives its powers from the consent of the governed.

Yesterday we celebrated the birthday of a great American, also a citizen of the world, Thomas Jefferson. That great Democrat said, "Let every man exercise his just and equal right to vote". Today we are bowed in grief over the passing of another great American, another great democrat, Franklin D. Roosevelt. To our departed Commander-in-Chief is attributed the following, "The right to vote must be open to all our citizens without tax or artificial restriction of any kind".

That great Alabamian, Lister Hill has said, "The Alabama poll tax, because of its cumulative requirements, is the most burdensome, restrictive, indefensible and undemocratic of any state". Summing up his statement Senator Hill says, "The poll tax in Alabama must go".

Jennings Perry, Editor of the Nashville Tennessean, has written a book entitled, "Democracy Begins at Home". Let Alabama's citizens who have ever been forefront in the fight for democracy in the nation and the world now demonstrate some of that democracy at home, here in Alabama, by eliminating the poll tax.

Some have said it is better to take our medicine in broken doses and retain the poll tax, reducing the cumulative provision to two years. If you have an infected appendix no surgeon would think of removing only a part, nor would he extract one tonsil permitting the other to remain infecting the whole body. So should this cancerous growth on the body of our democracy be removed once and for all.

INFLUENCES OF THE PAST

By H. Clarence Nixon

Note: This is a part of an article by Mr. Nixon as carried in a pamphlet of the American Council on Public Affairs, entitled "The Poll Tax", published in 1940. Mr. Nixon, a member of the faculty of Vanderbilt University, is a resident and voter of Calhoun County, Alabama. It is included as perhaps the best brief account available of the poll tax as a voting requirement in the United States.

There have been two eras of poll-tax requirements for voting in American history. In the first era, following the war of the Revolution, the requirement was applied as a substitute for general property qualifications for voting and represented an intermediate step toward a wider manhood suffrage. The broadening of the suffrage was in accordance with the teachings of Benjamin Franklin, Samuel Adams, Tom Paine, and Thomas Jefferson. In the second era, beginning about 1890, the poll-tax policy was resorted to again, in the South, distinctly as a modification and limitation of Democratic suffrage, following the Populist threat to the "Solid South" and to Bourbon rule in the South. Thus the poll tax has furnished a step toward democracy and subsequently a step away from democracy, the democracy of Franklin and Jefferson.

The property test for voting was rather general in Colonial times. However, by 1789, when the Federal Constitution became operative with George Washington as President, five of the states had shifted entirely or partly from the property test to some form of tax payment for voting. These were Pennsylvania, New Hampshire, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia. The movement from property test to tax test progressed rapidly in the decade following the inauguration of Government under the Constitution. Small poll taxes were supplanting property requirements, or both tax and property requirements were being abandoned. Vermont, in 1791, and Kentucky, in 1792, entered the Union with full manhood suffrage.

The popular victory of Jefferson at the turn of the century strengthened the trend toward a broad suffrage, and the emergence of the common man in the Jackson period all but completed the task of removing tax requirements for voting. Mississippi, in 1817, was the last state to be admitted to the Union with a property or tax-paying qualification. The new pace was set by the sister state of Alabama, which entered the Union in 1819 without economic restriction on voting. The spirit of equality on the frontier meant free manhood suffrage. There issued from the frontier a breeze of democracy to stimulate the general suffrage movement in the older states. The last states to give up property qualifications were Tennessee, Rhode Island, New Jersey, Virginia, and North Carolina, and the respective dates of their relinquishments were 1834, 1842, 1844, 1850, and 1856. The change in Rhode Island, where there had been no extension of suffrage since Independence, was brought about only after the formation of a People's Party in 1841 and the consequent crisis marked by Dorr's Rebellion. By 1860 tax-paying qualifications had largely disappeared. Such restrictions at that time existed only in the six states of Delaware, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, North Carolina, and Georgia.

The new South, after the middle of the seventies, experienced the restoration of home rule, with white supremacy and general manhood suffrage, in a period which was characterized by a wide industrial expansion and the spread of an agrarian crusade in America. Industrial progress and rural poverty were becoming evident in the South and in the rest of the country. Henry Grady in the eighties noted that in the South farmers were sinking into economic slavery. There was much evidence for the opinion that from the Potomac to the Rio Grande the merchants were prosperous and the farmers were poor. Agrarian unrest sprang from crop liens, farm mortgages, and a mounting tenancy in the face of tight money and low prices for farm products. There was a Granger movement, followed, in turn, by the Farmers' Alliance movement, the Populist movement, and the Bryan free-silver movement, accompanied by a somewhat feeble but prophetic organized labor movement.

Ben Tillman in South Carolina, Tom Watson in Georgia, and Reuben Kolb in Alabama, were among those leaders who battled in the South for the discontented. The political power of railroad attorneys and conservative Bourbons were distinctly endangered. The "wool hat" boys were on the political war path. Politics became hot, and politicans purchased firearms. Negro voters were caught between political factions, economic groups, and even sectional differences. Something had to be done and done quickly to make the South safe for the supremacy of white Bourbon Democracy. Hence, the suffrage base was drastically reduced at the expense of Negroes and poor whites. Hang-over feelings from Reconstruction days caused many an honest man to go along with the restrictive movement. Not all were so consistently honest as Governor Aycock, of North Carolina, who did not stop with the literacy test for voting but advocated and put through an educational program aimed at universal application with inclusion of both races.

The narrowing of the suffrage in various Southern states was effected approximately within the period between 1890 and 1910. It was brought about through constitutional and statutory changes with provisions for new registration and tax-paying requirements. The registration requirements for voting were extensively discussed during the period of adoption or ratification. They generally involved literacy and property qualifications, frequently with the temporary application of variants of the "grandfather clause." Such constitutional restrictions were put into effect by Mississippi in 1890, by South Carolina in 1895, by Louisiana in 1898, by North Carolina in 1900, by Alabama in 1901, by Virginia in 1902, and by Oklahoma in 1910. Oklahoma made the use of the "grandfather clause" permanent, only to have it declared unconstitutional by the United States Supreme Court.

It was generally understood and frankly stated that these measures for regulating and restricting registration for voting were designed to take the Negro out of politics but to "disfranchise no white man." Said the Louisiana constitutional convention chairman, "Doesn't it let the white man vote, and doesn't it stop the Negro from voting, and isn't that what we came here for?" John B. Knox, president of the Alabama convention, assumed that it was within the limits of the Federal Constitution to "establish white supremacy in this state." A member of that convention was quoted as saying that he would disfranchise Booker T. Washington if he could. The campaign for ratification of the Alabama constitution of 1901 was conducted with emphasis on the issue of Negro disfranchisement. In North Carolina there had been pre-election emphasis on literacy qualifications and white supremacy.

The post-Civil War poll-tax qualification for voting was put in the Tennessee Constitution in 1870 but was not effectively applied under statute until 1890. Virginia experimented with it between 1875 and 1882, abandoning it under the governor's criticism that it "opened the flood gates of corruption." Florida started with the poll-tax requirement in 1889, followed by Mississippi in 1890, Arkansas in 1892, South Carolina in 1895, Louisiana in 1898, North Carolina in 1900, Alabama and Virginia in 1901, Texas in 1903, and Georgia in 1908. Only North Carolina, Florida and Louisiana have abandoned the requirement.

The literacy qualifications and other registration tests were given so much popular attention as to overshadow the accompanying movement for poll-tax requirements for voting. The literacy test and the "grandfather clause" were distinctly connected with the race question and Negro disfranchisement, with no little agitation. In comparision, the new poll-tax requirement was something of a "joker," applying equally to whites and Negroes. It was sometimes assumed that Negroes would habitually be more neglectful of voluntary payment of poll taxes and preservation of receipts than whites. But there were significant comments on the effects of the tax on white suffrage. The Birmingham Age-Herald (May 19, 1901) observed that it would "confine the electorate to the more conservative and intelligent portion of the population," as demonstrated in "three other cotton states." There were those who baldly said that the poll tax was an important method for getting "rid of the venal and ignorant among the white men as voters."

But, by and large, the prospective effect of the poll tax on white voting could not be emphasized and advertised, for such talk would turn the hillbillies and Populists against the whole proposal. It was effective strategy to utilize the race issue, to preach Negro disfranchisement, and to give assurance that "no white man would be disfranchised," meaning that whites would generally be allowed to register. The whites of the hills helped to vote the Negroes out of politics immediately and at the same time to prepare the way for their own gradual loss of the vote. Such results were desired by many of the conservative leaders, who wished to be troubled with Populism no more. It is not unfair to class with these leaders the president of the Alabama constitutional convention of 1901, who was a corporation lawyer with large fees from railroads, who travelled on free passes, who was scornful of the progressive movement in America, and who was severely critical of Woodrow Wilson. The whole story of the forces involved in the Southern suffrage restriction movement has not yet been told. Meaningful history here remains to be written.

ARGUMENTS OF THOSE WHO FAVOR FEDERAL REPEAL OF THE POLL TAX

Note: Since none of the speakers touched on the much discussed proposal for the repeal of the poll tax by Congress, this resume of the main points in their argument as to the constitutionality of Federal repeal is presented for the information of those concerned.

The case for federal repeal in a nutshell is the contention that the poll tax as a requirement for voting in elections to fill a federal office is unconstitutional, in that the sovereignty of the Federal Government is impaired by a state tax on a federal franchise.

The basic question, they hold, is whether the payment of a poll tax is a "qualification" for voting in the constitutional sense. "If the payment of a poll tax has no rational relationship to the citizen's capacity to participate in the choice of public officials, it need not be treated by the Congress as a qualification within the meaning of the Constitution. A poll-tax requirement imposes a restriction on the citizen's right to vote, but if it is not a qualification in the constitutional sense, then it is within the power of Congress in regulating Federal elections to override such a restriction on the right of a qualified citizen to vote". U. S. Supreme Court cases referred to in presenting the above argument are Nixon v. Condon, 286 U. S. 73; United States v. Classic, 313 U. S. 299,315; Edwards v. California, 314 U. S. 181, 184-5; and Breedlove v. Suttles, 302 U. S. 277.

"In the exercise of its powers over Federal elections, continues the argument, "it is altogether fitting and proper for the Congress to prohibit State poll-tax requirements if in the judgment of the Congress such requirements unduly restrict the rights of national citizenship and make for fraud and corruption in Federal elections". The above is part of an argument submitted jointly to the Senate Committee on the Judiciary at the Poll Tax Hearings on S. 1280 (see pages 350-352) July 30, 1942, by F. Van Hecke and Robert H. Wettach, former and present dean respectively of the University of North Carolina; Myres S. McDougal and Edwin Borchard, professors of law, Yale Law School; Lloyd Garrison, dean of the Wisconsin Law School; Walter Hamilton, professor of constitutional law, Yale Law School; and others. Similar argument is presented by James J. Morrison, professor of law, Tulane University, in a pamphlet on The Poll Tax published by the American Council on Public Affairs.

Jennings Perry, editor of the Nashville Tennessean, at the Senate Hearings (pages 48-51) makes strong argument of the "clear mandate", as he interprets it, of Section 4 Article IV of the United States Constitution, which declares that "The United States shall guarantee to every State of this Union a republican form of government—" His argument in part is as follows:

"Our Nation set out to be a republic, or a democracy. There is no use splitting hairs over the term. We have fought great defensive wars in the high name of democracy. We are fighting one now....

"If we see plainly and beyond all doubting that a thing—a trick, a device, a subtlety—is vitiating and, in fact, has denatured the republican form of government in one, or more than one, of our States, is it not the duty of Congress to remove the obstacle, whatever it may be, and restore the republican form? Is it not an inescapable obligation—not moral alone, but expressly legal? The Congress shall guarantee—

"Our Republic rests on the right to vote. Our Federal Constitution declares it. Our State constitutions declare it. Simple honest logic declares it. Our Republic simply cannot exist without a right to vote securely in the possession of every citizen.

"Hence, if we see, with our eyes, this basic right attenuated and taken away, if we see terrible interference with its exercise, whereby not thousands, but tens of thousands, aye, millions of American citizens are deprived of their rights of sovereignty, whereby government is withdrawn from many and left with the few, the rule of the majority—if we can see these dire consequences and can put our fingers on the cause, then is it not the compelling duty of Congress to act? . . ."

Whether we agree with the Federal Repealists or not, the present or any U. S. Supreme Court may consider their arguments sound. Whereas members of the Conference in the main were for State repeal, some members feel that if the State fails to act, remedy must be sought in repeal by the Congress. Frank P. Graham, president of the University of North Carolina, in advocating repeal of the poll tax by Congress, emphasizes the difficulty of getting state action in this paragraph:

"A federal bill to abolish the poll tax is a clear necessity as well as a national obligation. The poll tax restrictions are embedded in the state constitutions. In contrast to a federal bill, an amendment to repeal the poll tax would have to originate in and be passed by the state legislature, the members of which have been elected by the poll tax system. In some states it would have to be passed not by a simple majority but by a two-thirds vote of the poll-tax legislature. In some states it would have to be passed by two successive sessions of the state legislature. If an anti-poll tax bill got through the state legislature, then it would have to be approved by the restricted poll-tax electorate of the poll tax states. . . . There is high promise for our freedom and democracy in the increasing insistence of Americans for full suffrage. Victories for freedom abroad inspire us to struggle for victories for democracy at home".

The Majority Report of the Senate Judiciary Committee of the 78th Congress on H. R. 7, the anti-poll tax bill, declares:

> "The right to vote for Members of Congress is a right, as the Supreme Court has said, granted under the Constitution of the United States and, therefore, any law, constitutional or statutory, of a state which taxes this fundamental privilege is contrary to the provisions of the Federal Constitution. . .
> "No state can tax a Federal function. This is a proposition which will have to be admitted by all and, if this Federal function—the right to vote—can be taxed by a state then the State has a right to destroy this Federal function which, is after all, the foundation of any government . . ."

Supreme Court Justice Stanley Reed, in the eight to one decision affirming the constitutional right of Negroes to vote in Democratic primaries in Texas, declared:

> "It may be taken as a postulate that the right to vote in such a primary for the nomination of candidates without discrimination by the State, like the right to vote in general elections, is a right secured by the Constitution."

It was generally felt by the Conference that so far as Alabama was concerned, federal repeal would not be necessary. Members accepted as true reports that Governor Sparks would recommend repeal in his message to the Legislature. If the Governor recommends repeal, we may expect the Legislature to respond to majority sentiment in the State for repeal. In this connection see page 48 for personal and editorial comment, which suggests how strongly sentiment for repeal is developing.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATION

Note: Representatives E. C. Boswell and Mark Hodo, who were scheduled to discuss the subject of Apportionment of Representation, could not attend. Represenative Boswell, however, has submitted a copy of his plan which has been under consideration by the Interim Committee on Constitution and Legislative Procedure, and Represenative Hodo has submitted a brief criticism of the Boswell Plan.

The Constitution of 1901 declares it to be the duty of the Legislature to reapportion senators and representatives following each decennial census. Since the Legislature has never performed this constitutional duty, the result is striking dis- or mis-apportionment. Next to the disfranchisement of hundreds of thousands of good citizens by the poll tax and other voting restrictions, misapportionment causes a miscarriage of democratic justice and gives our government a reactionary and oligarchic character.

Not only is the franchise limited to only about one-fourth of the potential voters of the State, but within this limited electorate, the political weight of a voter in one county is ten to fifteen times that of a voter in another county. The result is that the voters and political leadership of a small group of less populous counties are exercising undue power in the government.

In 1901, ten counties—Barbour, Bullock, Clarke, Hale, Henry, Lowndes, Marengo, Perry, Sumter, and Wilcox—were accorded two representatives each or twenty altogether, as well as eight senatorships. These counties declined in population from 326,334 in 1919 to 243,609 in 1940, or by 25 per cent. Eight North Alabama Counties—Calhoun, Cullman, DeKalb, Etowah, Jefferson, Marshall, Tuscaloosa, and Walker—with combined populations of 328,660 in 1900, were allowed 18 representatives and five and one-third senators. By 1940, they had increased by 539,219 to 868,879, or by 164 per cent. Yet they have had no increase in representation. These counties have 30 per cent of the State's population as compared with 11 per cent from the ten Black Belt counties.

Lowndes County, with a 1943 estimated population of 18,220, has two representatives and one senator, or an average of one legislator for 6,073. Jefferson County, with a population estimated at 470,383 in 1943, has seven representatives and one senator, or one legislator for each 58,798. The ratio is 10 to 1 in favor of the Lowndes Countian. Or viewed from another angle, Jefferson County's 42,000 votes in the 1938 primary nominated eight legislators to three legislators by Lowndes' 1446 votes—a ratio of 15 to 1 in favor of the Lowndes County voter. Cullman County, with a population of 17,849 in 1901 and apportioned one representative, in 1940 had 47,343 people.

According to the 1900 census, which gave Alabama a population of 1,828,697, the 106 representatives each represented approximately 17,250 people. The apportionment at that time was fair, with all counties of over 25,000 getting a second representative; Dallas and Mobile, three; Montgomery, four; Jefferson, seven. Only Jefferson was out of line, being entitled to eight at 17,500 each.

Boswell Plan.—There has been no adjustment of representation, although the population of the State had increased by over 1,000,000 in 1940, and great intrashifts of population have been apparent. Efforts to get reapportionments have been made after each census, but to no effect.

The Interim Committee of the Legislature on Constitution and Legislative Procedure has given study to the following plan of reapportionment recommended by its Chairman, Representative E. C. Boswell, of Geneva. Mr. Boswell describes the plan as follows:

> "The plan contemplates one senator from each county.
> "The plan for reapportionment of the House provides that the county with the largest population will have 7 members; the 2 counties with the next largest population will have 4 members; the 5 counties with the next largest population will have 3 members; the 17 counties with the next largest population will have 2 members; all others 1 member.
> Under this plan, if adopted, the Legislature will be required to reapportion after each decennial census, but as a matter of fact, the reapportionment would be automatic, and when one county would gain a member of the Legislature, some other county would automatically lose one because the membership would remain at 106 just as it is now, unless and except the forming of a new county.
> "Under this set-up Jefferson County would have 7 members; Mobile and Montgomery would have 4 each; Calhoun, Etowah, Madison, Tuscaloosa, and Walker would have 3 each; Chambers, Covington, Cullman, Dallas, DeKalb, Elmore, Houston, Jackson, Lauderdale, Lee, Limestone, Marengo, Marshall, Morgan, Russell, Talladega and Tallapoosa Counties would each have 2 members; all the others 1."

The above plan seems to be fair, allowing one representative for about 25,000, and two for counties with over 35,000, except in the cases of Jefferson and Mobile Counties, which on this basis should have 22 and six seats respectively. This would call for increasing the total to 123 representatives, Increasing the number of members of the House would probably be more equitable than increasing the 25,000 by several thousand, and scaling down the representation of smaller counties to keep the number at 106. In this connection see map on opposite page showing population increases since 1900, representation accorded in 1901, and apportionment recommended under the Boswell Plan.

Senatorial Apportionment.—Some have questioned whether the Boswell plan tends to equalize apportionment or rather to aggravate inequities already existing. This plan contemplates one senator to each county. On page 45 is a statistical exhibit showing population changes from 1900 to 1943 in the senatorial districts as outlined in 1901, and a redistribution of the counties looking toward districts of more equal population. This proposal leaves districts the same as at present where feasible. At some points the range is wider than is desirable. The map on page 44 shows this proposal for redistribution of senatorial districts.

Mr. Hodo.—Representative Hodo, of Jefferson County, who could not attend the Conference, has submitted the following criticism of the Boswell Plan:

"Unquestionably, the bill he proposes is going in the wrong direction. My complaint against his bill would be principally in the fact that it provides one Senator from each County. I still believe that representation in the Lower House should be in proportion to population. This has generally been true in the history of democratic governments and may we hope that it will continue to be, to some extent.

"I recognize the fact that smaller counties should have a certain amount of protection so that the more populous counties could not pass legislation derogatory to the less populous counties. However, I believe with the present apportionment in the Senate and with a more equitable apportionment in the House, it would lead to a better and more democratic system of government.

"As you know, the present Constitution provided for apportionment, and not since 1901 has the Legislature had the courage to do anything about it".

PERSONAL AND EDITORIAL COMMENT ON THE POLL TAX

Below is a representative, but not exhaustive, exhibit of personal and editorial comment on the poll tax during the last few years. Although predominantly in favor of outright repeal, some statements favor reduction of the cumulative requirement from twenty-four to from one to four years, and some urge retention of the present poll tax provisions.

Editorial expressions reflect a rapidly growing sentiment in favor of electoral reform from many angles. Newspapers which have favored poll tax repeal within recent years but which are not quoted here are the Anniston Times, Attalla Press, Baldwin Times, Decatur Daily, Franklin County Times, Montevallo Times, Pickens County Herald, and the Roanoke Leader. Newspapers favoring repeal or reform represent a circulation of approximately 450,000.

A. POLITICAL LEADERS

Thomas Jefferson: "The government of Great Britain has been corrupted because but one man in 10 has a right to vote for members of parliament. The sellers of government, therefore, get nine-tenths of their price clear. It has been thought corruption is restrained by confining the right of suffroge to a few of the wealthier of the people; but it would be more effectually restrained by an extension of that right to such numbers as would bid defiance to the means of corruption."

Franklin D. Roosevelt: "I have opposed the poll tax all my life."

"The right to vote must be open to all our citizens without tax or artificial restriction of any kind."

Governor Chauncey Sparks: "In my judgment, the cumulative feature ....is a deterrent to the exercise of the franchise by many of our best people. Many of our citizens neglect or forget to pay their poll tax. Several successive years of neglect or forgetfulness pile up a real barrier.

"The poll tax is not a qualification to vote, but rather a 'condition precedent' to use of the ballot. The procedure through which the ballot is kept pure is registration, not payment of the poll tax". (In his message to the Legislature, May 1, as reported in the Montgomery Advertiser, May 2, 1945.)

Senator John Tyler Morgan: "Without suffrage, the new system had no possible means of expressing the sovereign will of the people in laws and their enforcement by executive and judicial authority. These necessary agents of the government, by and for the people, can only be chosen by voters; and voters could only be created by law, not by inheritance. These voters are chosen representatives to perform the single function of electing the lawful officers of government. The trust confided to them is personal and can neither be sold, delegated nor transmitted by inheritance or by will to any other person. It is this quality of non-transmissibility that distinquishes it from the regal form of inheritable power and marks the line of the impassable gulf between regal government and democratic government. The voters, as a class, or body, have certain physical conditions such as age and sex that are necessary qualifications and certain moral and political qualifications that are personal and independent of heritable blood. To make blood the medium of transmitting the electoral power from father to son is to uproot from its foundations, the whole system of democratic government, and to reinstate the system and form of regal government . . . The transmission of the electoral power by the blood of inheritance from father to son, would destroy all distinction between regal government and democracy, and would throw the door wide open for a return to the system that the American revolution abolished . . ." (Quoted by Atticus Mullin in the Montgomery Advertiser, March 28, 1945.). Note: Morgan was a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1861 and served as United States Senator from 1877 to 1907.

Senator John H. Bankhead: "As far as I'm concerned, it's a matter of State decision and I leave it to the State without comment." (Quoted by Atticus Mullin in The Montgomery Advertiser, February 16, 1945).

Senator Lister Hill: "The poll tax in Alabama must go. The present law is the most burdensome, restrictive, indefensible and un-Democratic of that of any State because of its cumulative provisions. In Alabama we have exempted the members of the armed forces in World War I and in the present World War, but the mother of a boy on a fighting front may have to go back and pay $36 to cast her vote and have her say as to what kind of government and nation her boy is fighting to save. Southern States which have repealed the poll tax have proved the fears of opponents of repeal are groundless. The fitness and eligibility of citizens to vote in Alabama is determined under State registration laws and by county registration boards and not by the poll tax. The effect of the poll tax in Alabama, however, is to disfranchise several hundred thousand white men and women who are fit and qualified to vote. There may be some who wish these white men and women to be disfranchised and want an electorate limited . . . knowing such a limited electorate increases their power and their chances for control of our State and government. Alabama is one member of the family of the United States and I am confident that it is to her interest to have the approbation and good feeling of the other members of the family which her repeal of the poll tax will bring her. The power to repeal the poll tax rests with the people of Alabama . . . Knowing the Legislature as I do, I am sure that at its forthcoming session in May its members will not deny this right to the people of Alabama." (Quoted in The Montgomery Advertiser, February 15, 1945).

William C. Fitts (Surviving delegate for Tuscaloosa County. Washington, D. C., Oct. 24, 1942): "People deprived of representation in the lawmaking branch of their government are deprived of the prime essential element of freedom. Just words about four freedoms are empty in their ears, when the one freedom on which all others are dependent is withheld." (Letter in the Montgomery Advertiser, October 27, 1942)

Judge Walter B. Jones: "So, as we look upon the movement to repeal poll taxes in Alabama we find that the poll tax system has worked well in the past; it has kept a mass of unworthy people away from the polls, and it has placed several million dollars in the treasury for the purpose of educating the future voters of the State.

"Those who urge the repeal of this poll tax, and who talk of "Alabama's voteless thousands", "the political rule of a privileged minority", "the poll tax undermining democracy," and similar clap-trap, offer the State one thing in exchange for repeal of the poll tax: the hope that there will be a large number of voters to go to the polls and take part in public elections. And that hope at best is based on speculation and conjecture.

"Assume that the repeal of the poll tax requirement is accomplished, and that a larger percent of the voting population qualifies to vote and goes to the polls, then have we any assurance that this increase in the electorate will be of the highest type of citizenship? Have we any reason to believe that they will be intelligent and capable of wisely exercising the franchise?" . . . .

"The contention that the mere payment of a poll tax keeps people away from the polls can only be sustained by conjecture and speculation. For instance, we have in Alabama today, certainly not less than 20,000 Negroes who served as soldiers in the last World War. Under the law they are not required to pay a poll tax in order to vote, they are exempted by the Constitution; but I doubt if as many as two hundred of these Negro war veterans have ever taken the trouble to vote. Certainly, as far as they are concerned, something besides the payment of a poll tax keeps them away from the polls, because they do not have to pay a poll tax." ("Constitutional Convention of 1901 and Poll Taxes", The Alabama Lawyer, January, 1943)

Senator Richard Kelly, (Sylacauga): "A man or woman who has no more interest in education than $1.50 represents for 24 years of their life ought not to vote. A man or woman who has children ought to be happy and willing to pay that small sum into the treasury for the education of the children they have, the children they may expect or the children of their neighbors. And another thing, I don't want to be dragooned into doing something. If they would let us alone up North we would settle this question and settle it right". (Quoted by Atticus Mullin, in The Montgomery Advertiser, February 16, 1945).

B. COLUMNISTS

Charles N. Feidelson: "What is the real issue? It grows out of the fact that our politicians prefer to keep the electorate as small as possible. As things stands, the problem of getting themselves and their friends elected is fairly manageable. But with the poll tax eliminated, they would have to take cognizance of a great body of new voters—mainly whites and only incidentally Negroes. It is only too plain that the poll tax, made specifically obnoxious in this state by its cumulative feature, is shutting out of full democratic action a vast army of white Alabamians. That is the purpose of the poll tax, according to one school of thought, which contends that it was placed in the constitution in 1901 at a time when reactionary interests were still reeling under the impact of the agrarian revolt. The Populist movement, it is pointed out, had thrown conservatives into a dither. Something simply had to be done to keep these wild men and wilder ideas from causing more trouble. So the one-gallus farmer and the underpaid workers were attacked at their weak point—their pocketbook. Under this theory, talk of "white supremacy" has all along been so much camouflage hiding the actual motivation of those who benefit from restricted suffrage. Be that as it may, the fact is that the slogan no longer fools anyone. The fact is, furthermore, that sentiment in Alabama against the poll tax has grown so formidable that politicians are beginning to worry. There is little likelihood that the present Legislature will remove the tax. Gov. Sparks has given no sign of being interested in the subject. Why, then, are the poll taxers so disquieted? What have they to fear? They are afraid that Georgia's elimination of the poll tax will steel public opinion in Alabama into an incoercible demand for similar action in this state." (The Birmingham News, February 9, 1945).

John Temple Graves, II: "The right to vote, it seems to us, should not depend upon whether a man has a dollar or so. It should depend upon his possession of the minimum of education without which voting can be a blind and vicious thing. The voting test in Alabama should be not dollars but sense!" (The Birmingham Age-Herald, November 10, 1938).

Atticus Mullin: "The poll tax abolition will not result in negroes voting in Alabama any more than they are now voting. The poll tax abolition will not result in rag time irresponsible white people voting any more than they now vote. Other Southern States have abolished the poll tax and they have suffered no ill consequences. As a matter of fact, there are quite a number of ignorant, dull, shiftless whites in Alabama who are disfranchised, both because of the registration laws and the poll tax. They probably outnumber the negroes who are so disfranchised. Neither ought to be allowed to vote per se, but both ought to be allowed to vote when they are ready to assume their full responsibility as citizens." (The Montgomery Advertiser, February 20, 1945).

C. CITIZENS

Jesse B. Hearin, Montgomery: "In our attempt to maintain white supremacy, with which the poll tax has nothing whatever to do, we have unwittingly discouraged and disfranchised thousands of honest white men and now only a small, smug, scant segment of our population exercises the privilege of voting. Surely this is not the kind of democracy we fight for. Our neighboring State, Mississippi, with 800,000 fewer white people than Alabama, polls nearly 100,000 more votes in the white primary than Alabama. Mississippi requires only two years' poll tax and does not have many of the disqualifying reasons found in our Constitution to deprive one of his franchise. Louisiana with no poll tax whatever and with 500,000 fewer white people than Alabama maintains white supremacy and polls from 150,000 to 200,000 more votes in the Democratic white primary than we poll in the great State of Alabama. We vigorously deny the right of Ohio, New York, Pennsylvania or any other State to meddle with our poll tax or franchise; but surely we people of Alabama must realize that we, in good sense and good morals, must ourselves do away with an archaic, unnecessary, undemocratic, clumsy, fussy poll tax. We owe this to our own people. We owe it to our place in the world of democracy. I am an orthodox Southerner, a son of the Confederacy, and a Black Belt voter, but I am an American and I am also a Democrat. My sons, along with the sons of other Alabamians, fight for world-wide democracy, for freedom of thought, freedom of expression by word of mouth or by ballot. It is about time that we opened the doors of democracy and opportunity to our own people in Alabama. The poll tax belongs to another age. It belongs to a line of thought and reason that is not consistent with the philosophy of modern democracy. We belong to Today and to Tomorrow and not to Yesterday. We belong to a progressive, moral, democratic age where our men in general, can work together, walk together, fight together, and vote together." ("Alabama's poll Tax", The Montgomery Advertiser, August 3, 1944).

Thos. J. Robinson: "Democratic Chairman McCorvey says to repeal the poll tax would "open the flood-gates to radical elements . . ." What radical elements have we in Alabama that are barred from voting by the poll tax? It is always the honest poor man who is disfranchised by the poll tax. A man whose vote is for sale can always find some one to pay his poll tax. The more free and independent votes we have the harder it will be for machine politicians to control elections. Of all the poll tax laws in the statute books Alabama's is the most iniquitous. In Mississippi if a man fails to pay his poll tax he forfeits his right to vote for one year. But in Alabama he has to pay the accumulated taxes of all the years he has failed to vote or he is disfranchised for life. To a politician any man is radical and dangerous if he is on the other side. From the trend of the last few elections the radical element is gaining. We elected one for President in 1932 and like him so well he is still there. They elected one for Governor of Georgia, and now they are seriously considering changing the state constitution so they can elect him again. Who knows, we may some day elect a radical Governor of Alabama, with a radical Senate, a radical House and radical courts, and invite the whole world to a radical state where the poorest man's rights are sacred..." (Letter to the Editor, The Montgomery Advertiser, February 23, 1945).

Lee M. House, U.S.N., Norfolk, Va.: "I am writing you to enter a protest to the way the service men from Alabama are treated in regard to voting. I entered active service at Birmingham Feb. 12, 1942. Up to that time I paid my poll tax each year, and I voted at each election. I wrote this year for a ballot and was refused one for I had not paid the poll tax for 1942 and 1943, and was advised that this tax would be forgiven after Nov. 4, 1944. In other words, if I live I could vote in the elections in 1948. When the tax was due to be paid in 1942, for part of that time I was in the invasion of Africa and part of that time I was on a raft in the Atlantic praying to get back to the state that I had offered my life for but cannot vote in. How could I be expected to be lined up at the courthouse in Birmingham at that time? Today I mailed the poll tax that is due for when they become due again I might be on another raft and the mail service is mighty slow out there and I do not feel that I would like for the state to forgive me the $3 taxes." (Letter to the Editor of The News-Age-Herald, May 7, 1944).

A. Whaley, Andalusia: "With the poll tax ramifications eliminated, there are still all the safety provisions for taking care of the necessary intelligent, educational and other character attributes necessary for a splendid American setup of qualified voters. Only some six states now have this poll or head tax condition requisite to casting the vote in elections and to participate in all other political angles which Americans and Alabamians participate in occasionally. Both major parties have gone on record against the voting angle of this poll tax; Alabama has the leadership in the United States Senate, to wit, Hon. Lister Hill; if we expect to lead we must pay the fiddler." (Letter to the Editor, The Birmingham News, March 7, 1945).

D. ON NEGROES VOTING

Emory O. Jackson, Managing Editor, Birmingham World: "On Dec. 13 they (Jefferson County Board of Registrars) refused a (Negro) teacher registration because she could not explain to their unreasonable satisfaction the phrase, "Domestic Tranquillity". Such a question has absolutely nothing to do with one's qualification for voting. On Dec. 9 they refused two women who presented evidence that their husbands own and pay tax on property valued at more than $300. On the same day they refused a World War I veteran who presented his honorable discharge from the Army. One is not accepted for military service unless he can fulfill literacy requirements. Hence no reasonable board would require evidence of literacy better than that which has the authority of the United States government behind it. May I submit that for a full hour on December 14 the registrars stalled by watching the clock, which appeared to be an obviously deliberate attempt to keep from getting to the applicants. It was apparent that someone attempted to get the impression of a disturbance occurring, as a person identified as being from the sheriff's office came on the scene. The registrar's office opens at 8:30 a. m. and closes at 4:30 p. m., which allows little time for war workers and school teachers to get there to register. Registration periods are usually 10 days long. School teachers came from Rosedale High, Brighton High, Hooper City High and some from the city schools. They do not get out of school until 3:45 and therefore had to rush to get to the office before it closed. . . . As an accredited newspaper reporter, I have submitted in writing a request for registration statistics which are public records, but each time I am denied this information. I write this with the hope that it will lead to a thorough investigation of our registration system." (Letter to the Editor, The Birmingham News, December 19, 1944).

D. C. Whitsett, Minister, St. Mark's Methodist Church, Montgomery: "Your editorial this morning on "The Poll Tax Test" was good and true in content but what you didn't say speaks volumes. Abolition of the poll tax will not bring in the Utopia but it will remove certain obstacles to the development of democracy. The issue is embarrassing because "outsiders" are interested in the democracy of eight Southern States like we are in democracy in India. Wouldn't it be wonderful if some one "insider" would be intellectually honest and Christian enough to face the facts as they are and urge that we do something about it. Florida and Louisiana have eliminated the poll tax and Tennessee has tried . . . Last year one of the leading business men in Montgomery and I were requested to "sign" for a Negro to vote. Not because he couldn't sign his name but because of his color. He is a graduate of Tuskegee, has his Masters degree and has almost completed his work for a Ph.D. at the University of Chicago. He is a minister in our city, director of the USO for Negroes, former teacher at State Teachers' College, but all this did not "qualify" him to vote. After he was reluctantly registered by the board of registration the chairman said to us, "I'll approve him but don't ever bring this class person here again." In spite of insulting remarks the Negro didn't open his mouth and later said, "I'm sorry I caused you embarrassment." It would be good for democracy and for our souls for some one who was born and reared in the South to take the lead in removing this stigma on our political system . . . Mr. Editor, we feel it would be a fine contribution if Grandma would lead out in The Cradle of the Confederacy until the faith we preach and the ideals for which we fight have become a reality. Yes, the poll tax question is a test; it is a test of our liberality; a test of our willingness to enter the world revolution progressively; a test to the fairness of our treatment of the poor of the South; a test of our belief in the rights of an individual regardless of color; a test of our willingness to apply the freedom at home; and a test of our sincerity in the application of democracy." (Letter to the Editor, The Montgomery Advertiser, November 1, 1943)

E. EDITORIAL COMMENT

THE ALEXANDER CITY OUTLOOK

"In our opinion, if Alabama should abolish the poll tax, the State Legislature should not abolish it outright. They should take the first step by abolishing all but three years. This method would give hundreds of citizens who are in arrears several years the privilege of paying three years back poll tax and the current year for $6.00. This extra money is needed by the schools and it would also give many women who have never paid poll tax the opportunity of voting at only a small cost." (Quoted in Lee County Bulletin, February 22, 1945)

ALABAMA COURIER (Athens)

Poll Tax To Be Up.—". . . Some change in the present law seems to us wise and necessary at this time. The cumulative feature of the present law makes it extremely expensive for anyone to vote who has not kept his poll tax paid up over the years . . . At least, we feel this part of the law should be changed so that payment of current taxes would entitle a qualified citixen to vote.

"It will be only a matter of time until the poll tax law is repealed as a whole. Some will disagree with this statement, but we make that prediction and believe that the time is not far off. Whether the people of the state are ready now for this step may be brought out in the next few months." (Quoted in The Birmingham News, March 5, 1945)

ALABAMA JOURNAL

Besides The Poll Tax.—"Propagandists who create the impression that a state which abolishes its poll tax throws open the ballot boxes to everybody are due for an awakening. It has suited their purpose to build up the fiction that only the poll tax is what bars the disfranchised in the Southern states. It has been represented that the recent action of the Georgia legislature in doing away with the poll tax heralded a field day for all who wanted to swarm to the polls. The Memphis Commercial Appeal which is one of the influential Southern newspaper advocates of poll tax abolition by state action sets the record straight in these words:

" 'Gov. Ellis Arnall of Georgia has recently made it clear that the state's repeal of the poll tax as a requisite for voting did not mean that all bars to the casting of the ballot had been removed. According to the new statute, the prospective voter must pass a literacy test. The person who wants to register must, if called on to do so, prove that he can read any designated paragraph of either the State or Federal Constitution. He must also be prepared to write from the dictation of a registrar any paragraph selected from either one of the aforesaid documents . . .

" '. . . As we have said before, Georgia did well to get rid of the poll tax for various reasons, and it did equally well to substitute other requirements for the safe-guarding of the ballot.' " (March 17,1945)

ANNISTON STAR

Poll Tax Is Doomed.—"It is pleasing to note that an antipoll tax bill will be introduced in the Alabama Legislature when it convenes next May, as the indications are that Alabama and Mississippi will be left practically alone as poll tax bitter-enders if we cling to the outdated and undemocratic impost. For the State of South Carolina has just voted almost unanimously to repeal the tax in that state, with the indications being that the House will go along, and sentiment against the tax is growing throughout the South.

". . . As a matter of fact, the franchise law was opposed by Morgan, ex-Govs. Jones and Oates; Frank S. White, later to become a senator; George P. Harrison, H. S. Dent and scores of other students of government. They not only regarded the tax as unconstitutional, but believed that it would establish "a permanent hereditary governing class, which is undemocratic, unrepublican and un-American." . . .

"Their contention that the law would be impractical of administration and that it would foster sectional animosities has been verified, as has their belief that many white voters of the state would be disfranchised along with the Negroes. 'We adhere firmly to the Jacksonian doctrine of equal rights to all, special privileges to none,' they stated in a minority report to the constitutional convention . . . ." (Quoted in The Birmingham News, March 15. 1945)

What About The Poll Tax?—'. . . In 1920, 21.1 per cent of Alabama's eligible voters actually went to the polls; in 1924, 13.4 per cent; 1928, 19.1 percent, 1932, 17.7 per cent; 1936, 19.3 per cent, and in 1940, 18.9 per cent.

"To anyone who believes deeply in the democratic way of life, consideration of these figures brings alarm . . . . And where only 20 per cent of the eligible voters bother to go to the polls, the government could hardly be called representative of all of the people.

"The fundamental cause of the trouble can of course, as always, be traced back to the individual—the people who don't think their vote is important enough to make any difference. But there is also the question of the poll tax to be considered. Statistics show that of the nine states where less than one-third of the potential votes is cast, eight are poll tax states. In only two states where there is no poll tax did fewer than half of the potential voters go to the polls. There is no way to argue with figures." (Quoted in The Birmingham News-Age-Herald, December 31, 1944)

THE AUBURN PLAINSMAN

In Answer to the Judge.—" . . . Judge Jones based almost his entire poll tax argument on the contention that the ballot is not a right but a political privilege that can be granted, limited, or withheld.

"No better answer could be given to this stand than that made by Neal Davis, editor of the Lee County Bulletin, in his yesterday's issue:

> 'If this be true, and perhaps it is, who has the right to grant this privilege in a democracy? Of course, in Germany, the Nazi Party and its dictator have the right. In Russia, the Communist Party has the right. But in the democracy, who has the right? In a democratic society the people are supposed to have the right to govern themselves. If the people govern themselves, how can they do this except through the ballot?In brief, it is fundamental to a democracy that the people have the ballot; the extent to which certain members of society are deprived of the ballot determines the extent to which democracy has been curtailed. In a state like Alabama, in which the ballot is given to ten per cent of the population, we might say that we have gone one-tenth of the way toward democracy . . . .'" (April 19, 1940)

THE BIRMINGHAM AGE-HERALD

Poll Tax Legislation—"It is gratifying that Gov. Sparks apparently is at least considering a recommendation to the Legislature looking to the abolition of the poll tax. That means that the governor has advanced beyond the position he took last Fall when he announced that he would do nothing in this connection so long as 'outside influence' was a factor in the situation. The governor has evidently come to see that if a thing deserves being done, the fact that it has disagreeable advocates is of secondary, if any, consequence . . . If we want to be sure of not being forced by federal action to get rid of the poll tax, we must make federal action unnecessary. Now that Georgia has cast aside the encumbrance, now that in states like North Carolina, Florida and Louisiana, the poll tax is dead without causing the heavens to fall, now that in Alabama and outside condemnation of the poll tax is rising to new heights, the 1945 Legislature may well seize the opportunity to clear the way for removal from the constitution of this money limitation on the right to vote." (March 23, 1945)

THE BIRMINGHAM POST

The Poll Tax—"Like many other controversial issues, the cause of poll tax reform in Alabama has not been helped by some of its more vocal and active supporters.

It is possible, of course, that were it not for the agitation of 'outsiders' we might never act, but their activity at the same time has furnished opponents of the reform with some of their most effective arguments.

It will be difficult for the coming session of the Legislature to consider the poll tax in an atmosphere of calm reasonableness, but if the representatives of the people of Georgia can do it then there is room for hope.

No one will debate the fact that the poll tax is a barrier to voting but anyone who has taken the time to examine it closely must agree that if fails to accomplish that for which it was designed and, by reducing the size of the electorate, may be far more costly than it is worth.

The voting of citizens not qualified to cast their ballot intelligently can be restricted without the poll tax. Since that is true why not do away with that tax entirely? It plays not only into the hands of the political manipulator at home but furnishes a burning issue for those outside Alabama who find it profitable to smear our name." (March 20, 1945)

Sparks and Poll Tax.—". . . The chief executive can hardly expect citizens of other parts of the country, having convictions on such a basic question, to be uninterested in how we deal with it. Whether any such have unduly interjected themselves into Alabama's affairs is a matter of opinion, but whether or not they have, the state's own right and duty to handle the matter on its own responsibility and as it sees fit have not been altered . . .

"Gov. Sparks' attitude will be very influential, perhaps decisive, when the time for definitive action comes. We hope he will see the issue in the light of its broadest meanings. If he does reform probably will be assured." (March 23, 1945)

Facts on the Poll Tax.—". . . If the poll tax is wrong in principle, it should be abolished by the states. But because the tax is under fire, those states where it exists have an obligation to reappraise it. Theirs is the responsibility of scrutinizing the tax anew to see whether it justifies its existence.

"That calls for facts, calmly collected and considered. Emotions are aroused on both sides of this question, but there are plenty of able and intelligent persons in the South who could carry out a thorough and objective study of the poll tax.

"As one of the states where a poll tax is collected, and as the state with perhaps the most burdensome tax of that sort, Alabama should be greatly interested in Governor Arnall's plan. Nothing can be lost by a factual appraisal of the poll tax, and much is to be gained by it. It would tend to take the question out of the realm of prejudice into the realm or reason, where all public questions should be decided." (December 12, 1944)

Invalid Arguments Against Poll Reform.—"The Montgomery County Board of Registrars has gone on record opposing reform of Alabama's poll tax laws, and three arguments are advanced in support of the board's position:

1. Reform would result in flooding the poll rolls with undesirable voters.

2. It would be unfair to those voters who have paid the $1.50 tax each year.

3. The schools of the state would lose heavily if the tax is made non-cumulative.

"In the first place, believers in democracy will ask who are "undesirable" voters, and does inability or failure to pay the tax constitute evidence of undesirability?

"A pamphlet prepared by the Alabama Women's Joint Legislative Council says that "democracy is based on the belief in the soundness of the judgment of a majority and on the right of all to have representation in the government which taxes them. . . . Payment of $1.50 a year is no guarantee of intelligence."

"As for the fairness of abolishing the cumulative features of the poll tax, it must be presumed that those who have paid the tax in the past have received their money's worth, else they would not have paid it. To put the tax on a fairer basis would be to give the same advantage to everyone. Is it fair to make an individual pay six years back poll tax in order to vote once? . . .

"Should the cumulative features of the tax be eliminated, there is every reason to expect that the net revenue to the schools would be increased, since a greater number of citizens would be encouraged to participate.

"Among the reasons for the widespread demand on the part of women's organizations for poll tax reform is the conviction that many wives are disfranchised under the present system. It is true that in many families the poll tax is paid regularly by the husband for himself, but the expense involved in paying back poll taxes—often accumulated before marriage or before the wife began to take an active interest in government—is considered too great." (January 13, 1939)

Teachers and Poll Tax.—'It will mean more to education in Alabama to have the citizens we have trained take part in settling of political questions than to receive the pittance from the tax and then see the vital matters of the state decided by only 10 to 30 per cent of the people, many of whom have been prodded by political leaders to dig up the price of the tax." (February 23, 1945)

CULLMAN BANNER

Why Beat Around the Bush?—". . . When any intelligent, forthright citizen courageously presents recommendations which would remove this stench from the past record of the great State of Alabama, he is immediately attacked by the so-called Black Belters, who can see nothing but the unmentionable Negro question. It seems to us that they are acknowledging a weakness and lack of intelligence that have not been theirs in running the state government of Alabama in the past. They have successfully dominated this great state of white electors with a small voting population for such a long period that few remember when the great northern voting counties had any representation or acknowledgement in our capital city. Why then should a small problem like Negroes' voting trouble these master politicians who have so clearly managed to manipulate and run the entire state? . . . It will take men with guts, honor, devotion and loyalty, such as is being displayed daily by men of every class, color and creed in our fighting forces, to stand up and fight in the face of blasphemy which will be hurled at them by the same crowd that has been entrenched in Montgomery so long that they have successfully overridden the Constitution of Alabama and fought off a reapportionment of our Legislature which our state laws have required for a period of over 20 years. We hope and trust that such men will be found and that a champion will seize the torch and take the lead." (Quoted in The Birmingham News, February 26, 1945)

CULLMAN TRIBUNE

"Sad are the accounts throughout history of people who have been forced to live in slavery; sadder are the reports of the cruelties being suffered by innocent humanity in the war torn areas of the world; saddest are the stories we hear from time to time about folks right here in Cullman County, folks who sold their privilege of voting last year to politically-minded persons for a measley dollar and half worth of poll tax." (Quoted in Lee County Bulletin, July 17, 1941)

"And now the die-hard polltaxers of Alabama are becoming disturbed by the talk that Governor Chauncey Sparks might lead a vigorous fight against the un-American suffrage law. (March 29, 1945)

DeKALB TIMES (Fort Payne)

The poll tax.—'" . . . We've expressed the opinion many times that the poll tax should be done away with in Alabama, but so long as it remains unabolished every citizen required to pay it in order to vote should meet that condition every year." (Quoted in The Birmingham News, November 25, 1944)

"For Poll Tax Repeal".—"Senator Hill is not the only member of Alabama's delegation in Congress who favors abolition of the state's poll tax. Congressmen Sparkman, Patrick and Rains also favor poll tax repeal. We are particularly glad to say that our own Fifth District is represented by a congressman who has the courage to state publicly that he favors this forward step in our state." (Quoted in The Birmingham News, March 8, 1945)

DOTHAN EAGLE

Sentiment Growing.—". . . the number of Alabamians who are urging repeal is growing daily and taking in some of our most level-headed and most loyal citizens. They are sincere in their belief it would be the best for Alabama if the poll tax is discarded, and they believe the right time is now so that meddling will cease.

"We hope that sentiment within Alabama to abolish this tax continues to grow and spread as it has in recent weeks, and that the proper leadership to put this legislation over will appear. With wise leadership a family fight within the state can be avoided and repeal of this old law can be accomplished on our own initiative.

"It is time that opponents of repeal rise above their old attitude of insisting that the tax continue solely because outsiders want it abolished. They are now fighting against their own people, fellow citizens who believe the tax serves no good purpose and want it repealed primarily for that reason, and secondly to halt the unjust and highly vocal tirades against the good name of this state." (Quoted in The Birmingham News, March 21, 1945)

Second Choice.—". . . However, we are not so naive as to believe repeal of the law will be accomplished any time soon, even though there is growing sentiment in the state for outright repeal. Yet some day repeal is coming, and when it does it will be on the initiative of the Alabamians.

"Until then cancellation of taxes down to a reasonable figure like $3 would be better than nothing. It would be, in effect, a compromise between advocates of repeal and those who insist stubbornly that the tax law be left as it is. Next to repeal, we would like to see such a compromise become law.

"It would increase Alabama's voting strength and that would be politically healthful for the state. There are many voters now disqualified because they owe past due poll taxes, whose total ranges from several dollars on up to $36, with the average probably $9 or $10. If they had the opportunity to straighten these accounts by paying only $3—for two years—the majority of them would gladly do so." (Quoted in The Birmingham News, February 9, 1945)

GREENVILLE ADVOCATE

The Poll Tax.—" . . . This newspaper has always inclined toward payment of poll tax, feeling that the vote is a privilege and should be worth $1.50 to any person. On the other hand, we fear that there may be some people who consider the $1.50 to be worth the vote and are willing for political friends to have a share in marking the ballot in return for paying the poll tax for them". (Quoted in The Birmingham News, February 28, 1945)

THE GROVE HILL DEMOCRAT

Setting George Right.—"We frequently see that statement by advocates of poll tax repeal that some Southern states have rescinded this provision as a requisite to voting. This is true. Louisiana and Tennessee have, but their records in recent elections would hardly qualify them as models. It is a condition and not a theory which we have to face in this matter of granting the franchise to the unfit." (Quoted in The Lee County Bulletin, June 19, 1941)

JASPER ADVERTISER

The Poll Tax Issue.—". . . We have exempted in Alabama all members of the armed forces in World War I and in the present war. We have exempted those over 45. There are several ways of looking at it. The man who stayed at home and worked in a war plant, or helped win the war by working on a farm, has some claim for poll-tax exemption. If you are going to exempt most of the men, then will we continue to discriminate against the women voters by taxing them?

"Essentially, it can be summed up in the fact that the poll tax is undemocratic . . ." (Quoted in The Birmingham News, March 12, 1945)

LEE COUNTY BULLETIN

Ellis Arnall's Snowball.—"An unsubstantiated report from Montgomery by the Associated Press last week posed the possibility that Governor Chauncey Sparks might ask the Legislature to recommend repeal of Alabama's poll tax.

"The AP story further said that such rumors were heard in capital corridors today, but the governor himself refused to comment. High administration leaders expressed themselves in favor of poll tax repeal, which gave credence to the reports from the governor's inner circle.'

" . . . Even in Virginia, Senator Byrd's bailiwick, there is positive talk of poll tax repeal . . .

"Seems as though Georgia's Governor Ellis Arnall may have started rolling a snow ball. After all it would be a bit embarrassing to be the last state in the nation to repeal the poll tax". (March 29, 1945)

Poll Tax Repeal.—"Senator Hill's sound, forthright case against the outmoded poll tax law cannot help but have the effect of rallying much support to the campaign to make Alabama's election laws more democratic. As this progressive Alabamian said, "The Alabama poll tax, because of its cumulative requirements, is the most burdensome, restrictive, indefensible and undemocratic of that of any state." It disfranchises several hundred thousand potential citizens who are 'fit and qualified to vote'. Any law which has this effect has no place in a democratic society.

". . . A money qualification is one which properly should not be taken into account in deciding who shall vote. Any tax which limits exercise of the franchise is undemocratic; that is the question." (February 22, 1945) (February 22, 1945)

Poll Tax Doomed.—". . . That old hack which says a person not interested enough in voting to pay $1.50 ought not to vote anyway, simply is not valid. There is no price on the exercise of a democratic right. It is not a privilege, but a right of a free man to have a hand in determining his governors.

"But there are no literacy tests. There is no genuine qualification. One must only have the money at the right time, and be at the proper place at precisely the proper time, if he desires to cast his vote six to 12 months thereafter . . ." (December 17, 1942)

"The Greenville Advocate says: 'Pity the poor fellow who forgot to pay his poll tax, and now faces two primaries and a general election without the privilege of casting a vote agin anybody.'

"Wetumpka Herald: 'And we pity the poor fellow who forgot to get some candidate to pay his poll tax and now faces two primaries and a general election without the privilege of selling his vote to anybody'. (Quoted in the Lee County Bulletin, February 19, 1942)

"Lee County Bulletin; 'Pity the poor fellow who didn't have enough to pay his poll tax, because now he can't vote against the fellows who keep the poll tax so they won't have to contend with a vote they can't buy.' Do you get it?" (Lee County Bulletin, February 19, 1942)

Sales Counter Democracy.—". . . In a democracy voting is more than a privilege; it is a duty . . . The people must be encouraged to exercise their right and duty; they must be urged to take an interest in government, and cast their ballots for the right as they see it. They are not likely to accept this responsibility as long as the privilege of voting must be bought by the payment of $1.50 in poll taxes each year—or $15 or $30 if they have not been voting in the past . . .

"In Alabama not more than one person out of ten votes, even after the most heated campaign. In some states the ratio is higher than one out of three. Here, largely because of the cumulative poll tax, we allow ten per cent of the population to control our government and then call our state a democracy . . ." (January 19, 1939)

THE MONTGOMERY ADVERTISER

Lister Hill.—"It becomes increasingly clear to the people of Alabama that they have, in Senator Lister Hill, a liberal representative who is admired and respected by liberal opinion everwhere . . .

"The cumulative provision of the poll tax law is indeed burdensome, and everybody knows that it has kept many intelligent citizens from voting in Alabama . . .

"Mr. Hill has given the people of this great State, and particularly the members of the Legislature, something to think about." (February 9, 1945)

Custer's Last Stand.—". . . But if poll tax reform must come, as it appears it must, then we shall prefer to initiate such reform rather than have it imposed upon us.

"Regardless of the merits of the controversy it would seem that a gradual elimination of the poll tax is a logical and inevitable step along the long road to democracy . . ." (May 26, 1944)

The Poll Tax Test.—". . . On the other hand, our state poll tax payment is a very simple and a quite effective measurement of the main qualities desired in a sovereign voter.

"Let's think for a moment of the Alabama poll tax as a test for fitness . . .

"What does the poll tax test? . . . The poll tax actually tests thoughtfullness-at-the-right-time and continuing interest. A man who is extremely ignorant and not much interested in good government simply cannot remember, cannot think, to pay his $1.50 between October 1 and February 1. Thereby the public is protected against his ignorant and purposeless ballot.

"If the poll tax is abolished, then the legislature must adopt some other standard of measurement for voters. The value of the existing plan is its extreme simplicity and ease of administration. A better but far more complex, difficult and expensive standard will be a comprehensive educational and character record as a basis for getting on the qualified list." (October 29, 1943)

Gov. Dixon and Alabama's Poll Tax.—". . . A system which permitted poll taxes to accumulate for ten or fifteen years, and then required payment of all back taxes before a man could become a voter, shocked his sense of justice, just as it shocks the sense of justice of most men who have given the subject serious thought . . .

"It is not a matter for Congressional handling. Whatever is necessary to be done about the poll tax should be done by the Legislature of Alabama as the elected representatives of the people of this state." (October 7, 1942)

Tell Me Thy Company.—"There were two principal contentions in the original Watchman (Greensboro) editorial.

"First: The poll tax is the ultimate Maginot Line behind which the South of today and yesterday finds refuge.

Second: That the landed gentry of this economically sick land have a vested interest in the people who till the land by gracious dispensation. . ."

"The Advertiser believes present poll tax laws are inimicable to popular democracy and should be reformed. How completely they should be reformed is somewhat questionable, but the fact remains that Alabama has not made any reform of any sort since the adoption of the 1901 constitution.

"The Advertiser does not believe that landowners, no matter how powerful they might be in wealth and political influence, have the slightest vested interest in the men they hire, on shares or salary, to till the land they own." (July 13, 1941)

SOUTHERN WATCHMAN (Greensboro)

Poll Tax Issue Phony.—"Reader's Digest, a sound, reputable magazine, quotes excerpts from Freling Foster's department, "Keep Up With the World." One of these excerpts is:

'Of the 10,000,000 Americans who are unable to vote because of poll taxes, at least 6,000,000 are white citizens.'

"That is a false statement, bearing not even a remote touch of the truth.

"There is not a man or woman in America 'unable to vote' because of poll taxes, unless that person be a pauper, and we have virtually no paupers with us today. The poll tax in Alabama is regarded as the most severe in the South. It is $1.50 per year. This $1.50—every copper cent of it—goes to the schools. Not a dime is deducted even for collection purposes.

Is there any man or woman in America, any child, any infant, who does not pay at least $1.50 a year in the form of other taxes—not only taxes on income and property but on food and clothing and everything else—without squabbling. The man who buys a quart of whisky pays more in taxes alone on that one bottle than he would pay on his entire poll tax for a year. The parent who feeds a child in Alabama pays far more a year on sales taxes alone on that child's food than he does for his own poll tax to educate that child and, incidentally, qualify as a voter.

"There are perhaps thousands of Americans, both white and black, who do not want to vote badly enough to pay $1.50, but to say that they are unable to vote because of the poll tax is to utter a deliberate and apparent falsehood. They simply had rather spend $1.50 on a dinner—and it wouldn't be a big one these days—or on the movies, or on an extra pair of hose, or for a bright necktie, or even in a crap game than pay it in for the education of our children. The only man or woman "unable to vote" because of the poll tax is the pauper, and in many states, the persons who takes a pauper's oath automatically disfranchises himself, so even the handful of paupers among us mean little or nothing when it comes to the poll tax. The anti-poll tax issue is a phony issue, trumped up by a bunch of political fakers. It is an amazing thing that so many decent Americans fall for it." (Quoted in The Alabama Journal, December 12, 1944)

SYLACAUGA NEWS

The Poll Tax Question.—". . . We agree with Senator Hill—or vice versa—that the time has come for Alabama to remove the prejudice-inspired, antiquated law from its statute books . . .

". . . the present Legislature is one of our best, an admission we have made many times, but if they fail to at this time prepare the way for repeal of the poll tax law, future administrations and future generations might well refer to this era as narrow of thought, prejudiced in judgment and politically complexed.

"It is safe to say that the very great majority of Alabama voters favor repeal." (Quoted in The Birmingham News, February 28, 1945)

Voters in Two States.—"Here are some figures for Alabamians to mull over at their leisure comparing Alabama with North Carolina:

"Population: Alabama 2,832,961; North Carolina, 3,571,623.

"Negro population: Alabama, 983,290; North Carolina 981,298.

"Total vote cast for president last month: Alabama, 243,458; North Carolina, 790,554.

"Total vote cast for Dewey: Alabama. 44,540; North Carolina 263.155.

"Total vote cast for Roosevelt: Alabama, 198,918; North Carolina, 527,399.

"North Carolina long ago got rid of the poll tax as a voting requirement. Can it be possible that this is responsible for the large percentage of the population going to the polls in the state?" (Quoted in The Birmingham News, December 13, 1944)

ALABAMA POLICY COMMITTEE

OFFICERS AND COMMITTEES

Officers: C. B. Smith, Troy, Chairman; Hubert Searcy, Montgomery, Hallie B. Farmer, Montevallo, Roscoe C. Martin, University, Vice-Chairmen; Chas. W. Edwards, Auburn, Secretary-Treasurer.

Executive Committee: I. J. Browder, Montgomery, Chairman; Donald Comer, Birmingham; Loula Dunn, Montgomery; Mrs. A. L. Thomas, Auburn.

OBJECTIVES

1. To encourage the organization of smaller policy groups throughout the State whose purpose will be, in general, the same as those of the larger organizations of which they are parts.

2. To foster enlightened discussion of the social, economic, and political problems peculiar to Alabama as they affect the citizens of Alabama and in relation to the remainder of the South and the Nation.

3. To engage in research and discussion to the end that definite policies may be adopted from time to time for which the organization will strive through its legislative and other appropriate committees.

4. To maintain a well-organized state policy committee which may be called into session when necessary for the consideration of matters pertinent to the welfare of the state.

5. To cooperate with other state organizations for the good of the southern and national organizations as wholes.

The Alabama Policy Committee is a section of the National Policy Committee.

NATIONAL POLICY COMMITTEE

OBJECTIVES

1. To encourage the formation of affiliated groups of responsible citizens whose common desire and purpose are to work towards the development of governmental policies by democratic means on the basis of the general interest rather than of special interests.

2. To supply such groups with concise summaries of the research and opinion of recognized experts and agencies on issues of regional, national and international importance.

3. To stimulate in these groups discussion of questions on which public policy is in the making.

4. To facilitate the exchange of thought and experience between groups in different parts of the country.

5. To encourage the active participation of group members in the democratic process of forming governmental policy in order that such policy may be evolved out of the organic life of the nation itself rather than be determined by pressure groups or governmental agencies.

Dear Dr. McGovney:

Following up our correspondence with regard to the Alabama Policy Committee let me add that I am informed by one of the officers of the Committee that to date there have been no Negro members and no Negro participation in their conferences. He says that the matter has never been raised, but that "the members of the Policy Committee, I am sure, are generally desirous of improving conditions economically, educationally, politically and socially, of the Negro race, an attitude which I feel is reflected through our publications." He further states that he may raise the question of Negro participation at the next Executive Committee meeting.

I suppose that what we have here is the sort of thing that happens so frequently, namely, that a group of white persons, even relatively broadminded persons, get together on some problem and simply forget that there are Negroes who are just as interested as they are. Fortunately, however, this sort of thing is becoming more and more rare.

Dear Mr. Johnson:

In reply to your letter of November 5 I wish to advise that to date we have had no negro members on the Alabama Policy Committee, nor have we had any negro participants in our policy conferences. The matter has not been raised as I recall. The members of the Policy Committee, I am sure, are generally desirious of improving conditions economically, educationally, politically and socially, of the negro race, an attitude which I feel is reflected through our publications.

I shall be glad to raise the question at the next executive meeting of the organization.

Very truly yours,

Dear Mr. Edwards:

We have had an inquiry as to whether Negroes can belong to the Alabama Policy Committee, and whether they have ever taken part in its meetings. I felt reasonably sure that they could belong, but I thought I had better check up with you before answering the inquiry.

All good wishes.

Sincerely yours,

Dear Dr. McGovney:

Thank you for your letter of October 29. I presume that Negroes are eligible to membership in the Alabama Policy Committee, but I am checking up on this point before I give a definite answer to your inquiry.

I am sure that you are right in assuming that the statement concerning a "reasonable educational test" was meant to apply to all illiterates.

I shall write you again soon. All good wishes.

Mr. Guy B. Johnson
Director, Southern Regional Council

Atlanta 3, Georgia

Dear Mr. Johnson:

I write for information. The Alabama Policy Committee is composed exclusively of whites, is it not? Am I right in assuming that Negroes are not eligible to attend its conferences? I want to make sure whether all the speakers were white.

At its conference (Alabama Policy Bulletin No. 14) April 14, 1945, the consensus of opinion was that the poll tax prerequisite to voting should be abolished.

At the same time the abolition of racial discriminations against Negroes in registration of voters seems to have been endorsed. That is what I infer from the wording of the constitutional amendment they favored. The Bulletin, at page 2, states, "As is indicated by the proposed amendment, complete removal of all restrictions on the suffrage was generally favored, with a number somewhat insistent that a reasonable educational or literacy test should be retained." From remarks made at the conference I infer that by a "reasonable educational test" was meant one that applied equally to all so-called illiterates.

I am anxious to know what was the composition of this liberal Conference. To what extent is it truly representative of Alabamians?

Yours very truly,

D O McGovney

Dear Cecil:

Here is the "catalogue" -- a presumptious name for a slim collection. It covers, however, what I recall as the principal items of discussion the other night.

All you have to do is recollect how vague many well informed Atlantans are as to the hotel and restaurant situation here, in order to appreciate how difficult hard information on this subject is to obtain.

We think everything in this "catalogue" is accurate -- we certainly have tried hard to make it so.

Although this is mimeographed, we are distributing copies only to the people who were at your house, and only one per person. If you are Gene would like additional copies, or would want me to send copies to other persons, please give me a call.

MUNICIPAL EMPLOYMENT

These are merely fragmentary notes, derived from a search of our files. They do not represent a full picture of any of the cities mentioned. We have simply noted instances of non-traditional employment which we had record of in our files. (All of this group of cities employ Negro policemen.)

Charlotte	-	billing clerk (employed July 1963, apparently first white-collar Negro in municipal employment).
Greensboro	-	cashier in tax assessor's office
Houston	-	4 process servers 6 clerical workers in county clerk's office* (hired 1963) 3 probation officers in juvenile court assistant pumper, 2 foremen in Water Department (hired 1963) 3 beauty shop inspectors in Health Department (hired 1963)
Knoxville	-	clerk in Registrar of Deeds office (hired October 1962)
Memphis	-	Assistant Public Defender 3 sheriff's deputies clerk at City Hall
Nashville	-	firemen supervisor in Welfare Department deputy tax assessor clerical personnel at Housing Commission
New Orleans	-	police sergeant
Richmond	-	6 of 28 fire companies are integrated; in July 1963 the all-Negro company was disbanded and re-assigned.

PUBLIC SCHOOL DESEGREGATION: NUMBER OF NEGROES IN SCHOOL WITH WHITES

(Unless otherwise noted, desegregation data is from various publications of the Southern Education Reporting Service. School census data is from various official sources. For each city, the first figure given indicates the first year of school desegregation. Cities desegregated in the late 1950's moved very slowly during the first years, and since have picked up momentum. Atlanta's present total is, among all the cities, whether starting earlier or later, the lowest, except for much smaller Greensboro.)

HOTEL AND RESTAURANT SERVICE

	Hotel and Motel	Restaurant
Richmond	4 leading hotels - the John Marshall, Jefferson Richmond, and Byrd - open. At least 5 motels - 2 Howard Johnsons, 2 Holiday Inns, and the Executive - open.	Most leading restaurants are open. About 25 were so before demonstrations summer 1963; approximately 90 have opened since.
Norfolk	Our information is that all, or virtually all, hotels and motels now open. Most of these changed policies in July 1963 or later; a few (e.g., the Golden Triangle) opened much earlier.	A few only open; these include some of best. All department store dining rooms open (until September 1963 there had been one hold-out).
Greensboro	5 motels -- Two Holiday Inns, Howard Johnson, Town House, Kent Court - open. Hotels still segregated, except for dining for some mixed meetings.	37 eating places open; this includes dining room of desegregated motels, department stores, and 6 first-class restaurants, as well as national and regional chains.
Charlotte	5 leading hotels -- Manger, Queen Charlotte, Sheraton-Barringer, Heart of Charlotte, Downtowner -- and 3 leading motels -- Coliseum, James Lee, Alamo Plaza -- open; maybe others.	As of July 1963, 110 of the 286 restaurants regarded before then as all-white were opened.
Knoxville	2 leading hotels -- Andrew Johnson and Farragut -- open; 4 others -- the Park, Atkin, Arnold, and St. James -- still segregated. 2 motels -- a Holiday Inn and the White City -- open; others apparently not.	More than 50 open, spread all over city. Practically speaking, all restaurants are open.

Hotel and Restaurant Service - 2.

	Hotel and Motel	Restaurant
Nashville	12 open: the Albert Pick, Hermitage, Andrew Jackson, two Holiday Inns, Noel, Downtowner, Allen House, Anchor House, Howard Johnson, and Alamo Plaza. The latter 6 of these opened October 1963; the former in May 1963.	Nearly all restaurants in city are open. The only notable exceptions are the Krystals, two hamburger shops, and one good restaurant.
Chattanooga	2 leading hotels -- Patton and Reed House -- and one motel -- Holiday Inn -- are open.	Most of the better restaurants are open, since July 1963.
Memphis	All leading hotel and motels open since May 1963	Confused picture. Apparently, only 1 first class restaurant, hotel dining rooms, and department store dining rooms are open.
New Orleans	All apparently segregated, except the airport Hilton Inn. 3 downtown hotels -- the Sheraton-Charles, Jung, and Royal Orleans -- agreed September 1963 to accept conventions with limited numbers of Negro delegates	All apparently segregated (except airport Hilton Inn.)
Dallas	All leading hotels and motels now completely open. A few small motels still segregated.	An estimated 75 - 85% open.
Houston	All leading hotels, except the 250 room Ben Milam, now open. About 6 motels are open; others did not go along with hotel agreement of February 1963.	Of 105 in restaurant association, all but 5 went along with desegregation agreement Spring 1963; some evidence that about 15 have since re-segregated.

Dear Cecil:

I have not overlooked your suggestion that I offer up some names of persons who might be included in a second conversation such as we had at your house several weeks ago. I think that now, following the statement of the so-called summit conference, there might be special value in meeting again.

Your remark was perceptive when you commented on the difficulty of inviting Negro friends to take part in such a meeting as we had, without giving seed to the thought that persons such as you, Helen, Sam, and Gene were representing the civic powers. In part, I think that my presence protects against that assumption, but not enough.

My hunch would be that the best approach would be to invite persons who are, in the first place, highly sophisticated and, in the second place, not to invite the persons who are the public spokesmen for the summit conference.

On the premise that the group, if it meets again, should be kept small, my suggestions would be Don Hollowell, Sam Williams, T. M. Alexander, Sr., and B. R. Brazeal.

Sarah Mitchell might be another interesting addition.

All the best.

Sincerely yours,

Mr. Cecil Alexander

Dear Cecil:

Here are a few thoughts regarding your "Program for Helping Resolve Racial Problems."

I doubt that anything as huge as you propose could get going without White House endorsement, and some necessary measure of White House initiative; especially does this seem required if quick action is wanted.

Were the President's interest in the idea obtained, a second need would be to be prepared with suggestions as to what steps should be taken. An obvious one would be the appointment of chairmen. Another possibility might be the convening of and otherwise mobilizing the leadership of the various groups called to the White House last Spring and Summer.

To my knowledge, two of those groups subsequently erected on-going committees. The most ambitious -- the National Women's Committee -- has, because it ran out of money, given up its staff, but it still maintains an identity and an office in Washington. The Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights Under Law has an office in Washington and a staff head: David Stahl, former attorney-general of Pennsylvania. Another group, in which President Johnson should have a special interest, that might be supportive is the Advisory Council on Plans for Progress; it has a chairman -- G. William Miller, president of Textran, Inc. -- and some kind of a staff.

The program would require money, and a good bit of it, and here too the White House would probably be indispensable. A call from it to the Ford Foundation or to one of the Rockefeller brothers or to Stephen Currier would be close to necessary to get the kind of attention needed; this is not altogether a simple matter of influence: more to the point, it would amount to assurance of high, authoritative backing for the effort.

Here are a few comments on the substance of the proposal.

I think religious bodies and unions should be included as "full participants." In the executive committee there should be labor representatives and educators. I see no reason to make a point of excluding persons from the civil rights movement: how in the _____ is the nation going to cleanse its soul shunning contact with the controversialists? It may be unrealistic to aim for July 4.

What has become of the enclosed idea I don't know. It comes from a staff paper (confidential) to Adlai Stevenson and other Trustees of the Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Foundation.

Will see you next Thursday night.

Sincerely yours,

Leslie W. Dunbar

PROGRAM FOR HELPING RESOLVE RACIAL PROBLEMS

1. Bring to bear the full participation of the advertisers, news media, and public relations in a saturation campaign dealing with the problem.

2. Organize a Committee of 10,000 - 200 from each state with an Executive Committee of 100 to promote the above program and support other projects.

   Committee will be composed of religious, industrial, professional, merchant and retired government officials - civil and military.

   Persons selected should not be in the civil rights movement.

   Honorary Chairman - former Presidents Hoover, Truman, Eisenhower, and Mrs. Kennedy.

   Possible Chairmen:

   W.H.

   General Clay
   Dr. Eisenhower
   Henry Luce

3. Purpose to present the Negro movement to both races as one of the final actions stemming from the American Revolution and in accord with our religious beliefs, our Constitution and human decency.

Suggestions:

1. Reaffirmation of the "life, liberty, pursuit of happiness clause of the Declaration with further specific reference to the Negro. This to be published simultaneously in all major newspapers.

2. Ask the Advertising Council to sponsor an all out campaign in every medium.

3. Highest level speakers in Civic Clubs.

Dear Les,

May we invite you to a meeting to be held

8:30 P.M., Wednesday, June 24th
The Alexanders' Home, 2322 Mt. Paran Road (west of the Marietta Highway)

As it now appears certain that a civil rights bill will pass, we are concerned with the next step after the bill becomes a law. In order to provide a forum for information and exchange of ideas, we have called an informal meeting to discuss specifically the public accomodations provision of the bill.

We are inviting leaders from government, civic organizations, communications, religious bodies, labor, law-enforcement agencies and several representatives of public facilities that have already met the provisions of the law.

The success of this meeting will depend on this wide-spread representation. Since we have limited those from each group, it is extremely important that you be there.

Please return the enclosed card.

Sincerely,

Rwlwood

To Employers Affected by Title VII of the Civil Rights Act

Gentlemen:

The National Citizens Committee for Community Relations has asked its Atlanta members to sponsor a meeting for the purpose of explaining the provisions of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 to those employers who will be affected by Title VII, beginning in July, 1965.

We have therefore set up the following program:

Time: Monday, June 7, 2:30 p.m.

Place: Architects and Engineers Building, Spring & Harris Sts.

Agenda:

1. Local case studies of equal opportunity employment.
   Speaker — To be announced

2. Explanation of the employment provisions of the Civil Rights Act.
   Speaker — From U. S. Department of Commerce

3. Training programs now in progress, and projected for the Atlanta area.
   Speaker — Charles O. Emmerich, Exec. Dir.
   Atlanta-Fulton County EOA

4. Skills and potentials of Atlanta Negro students.
   Speaker — Dean Harding D. Young
   Atlanta University

5. Discussion

We urge that you send a representative(s) to this meeting. Please return the enclosed card as quickly as possible.

Sincerely,

Cecil Alexander

SUGGESTIONS FOR AN APPROACH TO THE RESOLUTION OF THE RACIAL PROBLEM IN THIS COUNTRY

(A) Two basic problems:

(1) Acceptance of the Negro and other minorities as first class citizens by the white majority.

(2) Deterioration of confidence in the process of democracy and good will of the white man by the Negro and other minorities.

(B) Thesis:

The vast majority of white Americans have an uneasy conscience concerning the treatment of minorities based on the following:

(1) The basic beliefs enunciated in the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution concerning fair and equal treatment of all citizens.

(2) The teachings of the great religions of this country.

(3) The self held image of most white Americans that he is fair minded and favors the "underdog".

In spite of many contrary incidents, recent history has shown the willingness of many whites to work with Negroes to eliminate descrimination. There is also evidence of acquiescence to change on the part of many more. It is to this majority that the approach herein outlined is addressed.

(C) Basic Approach:

While there have been many scattered efforts to sway public opinion, these efforts have been uncoordinated, often lacked substantial leadership, and made only narrow appeals. It has been many times illustrated that concentrated support for issues which are fundamental in their appeal to Americans can be sold to them. It has also, unfortunately, been shown that other issues, not so worthy, can be sold until the true situation becomes evident.

The racial situation in this country has never received the all out concentrated support, that our polio drives, war bonds, or education have been given. Until we have tried this, no one can with assurance say that our problems cannot be amicably resolved.

In view of the above, it is believed that an appeal to patriotism, religious morality, and humanitarianism if properly sponsored, will affect vast changes in attitudes and enlist great areas of untapped support.

Such a program, to be effective, must be sponsored by the strongest possible non-partisan leadership , and enlist persons here-to-fore not primarily involved in the civil rights movement. The top brains in advertising public-relations, sociology, and communications must be brought together to map out a program. If the Negro revolution and the resolution of other minority problems can be shown as the final acts of the American Revolution the full force of this nation, except for perhaps the fifteen or twenty percent who are beyond convincing, can be mustered in support of this cause as the right and patriotic thing to do.

(D) Suggested Organization:

Form a national committee as follows:

(1) Honorary Chairman: Presidents Hoover, Truman, Eisenhower and Mrs. Kennedy.

(2) Active Chairman: Selected from the following list or others:

Ralph Bunch	Billy Graham
General Lucius Clay	Henry Luce
Dr. James Connant	Dr. Benjamin Mays
Dr. Milton Eisenhower	Ralph McGill

(Several Co-Chairman could be selected)

(3) Executive Committee:

100 Persons. (12 from each state)

(4) Total membership:

10,000 Persons. (200 from each state)

Membership to be drawn from following groups:

Business	Government
Religion	Women
Education	Veteran organizations
Labor	Civil Clubs
Professional	Chambers of Commerce

The nucleous of this membership might be the various groups called to the White House last Spring and Summer. These groups include the National Women's Committee, The Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights and the Advisory Council on Plans for Progress which are still in existence.

(5) Initial financing would be done through the major foundations.

(6) Staff:

The national headquarters would form a staff consisting of persons on loan from the various organizations of this country concerned with human relations. In addition, top advertisers, and communication media would supply personnel.

In each city a local budget would be set up to maintain a staff. This budget would be met by local funds, national funds, and where possible local government funds.

The Advertising Council should be enlisted immediately to launch a nation wide campaign in all media.

(7) Timing:

The foundation of this committee would be announced in all major cities on July 4, 1964. This announcement would reaffirm the signers belief in the "life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness" clause from the Declaration of Independence and further declare the need that this statement apply to all citizens.

The following are some random suggestions of what activity the committee might engage in -

(a) Set 1976, the two hundreth anniversary of the Declaration of Independence for the elimination of descrimination totally, in all areas of our public life.

(b) Set-up a medal and monetary award (similar to the Nobel Prize) to be presented by the President before a joint session of Congress for outstanding service in the field of human rights. Such awards might go to communities as well as individuals.

(c) Series of ads showing Negro participation in the history of this country and their present contribution to American life in all fields.

(d) Spread the idea of *Partners for Progress to all communities.

(e) Organize new type of descendants of the American Revolution groups who would be dedicated to the carrying out of the principals of the Revolution.

(f) Preparation of a text on the role of minorities in America and encourage its use in the schools.

(g) Set-up work shops with noted speakers in all major cities for business, labor, educational, religious and civic leaders.

* See Attached Exhibit.

(h) Give awards for outstanding artistic contributions to the cause including, literature painting, play writing etc. These awards to be made on a national T.V. program, similar to the Oscar programs.

(i) Declare a national day of integrated prayer.

(j) Encourage business men to set-up training programs related to native ability rather than education. Also encourage them to establish strong ties with Negro colleges and take an active and continuing interest in their graduates.

(k) Conduct theme and essay contests for high school seniors on a yearly basis.

(l) Obtain declaration of support from the national veterans organizations.

(m) Encourage Negroes in positions of wealth and leadership to promote programs in their own communities for training and education.

(n) Encourage the integration of Junior Achievement programs.

(o) Sale of "I Am An American" pins to be designed by a talented artist - and of certificates, car stickers, etc.

(p) Obtain declaration of support from all church groups, national organizations, labor unions, professional groups, etc.

These ideas are only a beginning. When the outstanding authorities in public communications are gathered together in this Committee, only then will a truly effective program be conceived. It is the very fact that the outstanding talents of this country can be brought to bear on this program, that makes this program compelling and possible of great achievement.

Dear Miss Clay: Thank you very much for your explanatory letter of April 3 which arrived hot on the heels of an answer from Harper's saying that they had a hard-and-fast rule that reprints must be handled by them. I am glad to know, however, that they made an exception in the case of the Council. Herewith we confirm the order for 1,000 reprints.

Would you work out with Miss Elvidge any financial arrangements in connection with these?

Dear Miss Clay: Just a few lines to let you know that Doctor Will is coming along slowly. This ishis fourth week in the hospital and he got up for the first time this week and is learning to get around his room with crutches. It seems there is a numbness in his leg and foot which may continue for an indefinite time. However the doctor hopes to let him out of the hospital maybe the end of this week. They are also giving him some kind of a brace for his back to try to help things along. I am sure he appreciates your letter with the news, but he still hasn't felt up to writing to anyone at all.

Dear Miss Oura:

The reprints of Dr. Alexander's article were delivered to us several days ago, but the printer had neglected to fasten the sheets together. It was, of course, necessary to return the entire lot, and the completed job has just been delivered to us. I am very sorry, indeed, for the unavoidable delay in filling your order for 1,000 copies, but I am having two packages of 500 copies, each, mailed to you today. The actual charge for the reprints was $19.60 a thousand. Although you suggested that a bill be sent to Miss Elvidge, I am enclosing one, which I shall appreciate your handing to her.

Thank you very much for keeping me informed about Dr. Alexander's condition. We are all disturbed and distressed to hear that he is still in the hospital, and that it is necessary for him to resort to the use of crutches. I do hope, though, that he will improve rapidly from now on and that he will soon be back in the whirl again. Knowing him as well as I do, I am sure that he finds it very difficult to be forced to lead a life of inactivity. I shall send him another note.

Sincerely yours,

EHC

Dear Miss Thorpe:

The Commission on Interracial Cooperation, to which your letter of May 7 was addressed, merged with the Southern Regional Council in February 1944. The enclosed pamphlet entitled THE SOUTHERN REGIONAL COUNCIL, ITS ORIGIN AND PURPOSE will acquaint you with the background and program of the new organization.

We have delayed replying to your letter in the hope that we might be able to tell you definitely when the revised edition of UNDERSTANDING OUR NEIGHBORS will be ready for distribution. The best we can do, however, is to say that our printer assures us that it will be off the press in time to reach you before June 1, in case you wish to place an order. Our usual charge for this pamphlet is $7.50 a hundred, which covers the actual cost of printing and handling, but because of our desire to cooperate with you in your Work Shop Conference we are glad to quote the following prices:

For outright purchase- 100 copies, $7.50; 200, at $6.00 a hundred; 300, at $5.00 a hundred, postage paid in each case.

For consignment- $7.50 a hundred, plus return carrying charges on any pamphlets not sold.

With the pamphlet describing the Council, we are including a sample copy of AMERICA'S TENTH MAN and our monthly paper THE SOUTHERN FRONTIER, which we hope will interest you. We are writing Mrs. Whitby, Assistant Director of the Interracial Committee, that we shall be glad to send copies of our materials for the exhibit which is being prepared for the Conference.

We shall look forward to hearing from you again.

Dear Mr. Henson:

Thank you for your letter of January 22. I am glad that you have brought to our attention the matter of including recreational opportunities for Negroes in the Etowah River Dam Project near Cartersville.

We have on our staff a very fine colored man, Dr. H. L. Trigg. We will see Mr. Roy Wood and others here in Atlanta right away and will plan to send Dr. Trigg to Cartersville for two or three days next week so that he can help as much as possible there.

Thanking you again for bringing this to our attention, and hoping that we can be of some real service, I am

RECEIVED
JAN 23 1946
Southern Regional Council

Dr. Guy Johnson,
Southern Regional Counsel,

Atlanta, Ga.

Dear Sir:

The Government is building a large dam on the Etowah River near Cartersville and proposes to create a recreation area of around 50 square miles to be devoted to the use of vacationist, fishing, wild life, boating, camping, etc. and has asked the people in this region for plans for their consideration of preparing the place for these uses.

We think this an unusual opportunity for us. We have no such place within reach and we are preparing all the data and suggestions we can get and have called in the National Park Service, the Smithsonian Institute and others, hoping to present such plans that will meet the approval of the Army Engineers and get something that will be of great benefit to the people of North Georgia.

They propose to set apart a section for the use of colored people and it is my impression that there are no such facilities for them now. It would be particularly beneficial to the negroes of Atlanta as it would be a drive of only about 30 miles. Just last evening I met with local negro leaders and they are very enrhusiastic about the matter and want to do what they can to promote the project, but myself, they are not experienced in such matters and need help. I told them I would write you and seek your aid in their behalf. Have you some one in your office or some one connected with one of their college there in Atlanta that couod come up here and help them present the matter. The reports must be in by the first of March.

The Engineer in charge, Colonel Mark M. Boatner, will be here on the 30th of January, at the Bartow County Courthouse, at 10 o'clock, A. M to hear suggestions and receive plans, if any are submitted. It would be well if yo8 could get this man to come to this meeting. He would have to come a day or two ahead so he could get the feel of the thing.

Mr. Roy Wood, Glenn Building, Atlanta, is interested in fish and wild life. You might call him and he might help, I am sure he would. He is to be here on Jan. 29th to make a survey and he likely will include this area for colored people, if requested to do so. He is representing the Fish and Wild Life Service of the Dept. of Interior and is coming at the suggestion of Rep. Tarver.

I suggest you communite with Dr. W.R.Moore, here.

Yours very trult, W. C. Henson

North Georgia Citizens Unify Plans For Allatoona Recreational Center

By WELLINGTON WRIGHT,
Constitution Staff Writer

CARTERSVILLE, Ga., Jan. 30. Development of the recreational facilities of the proposed Allatoona lake on the Etowah river near here will bring from $10,000,000 to $15,000,000 in new money each year in this area, according to estimates made here Wednesday.

At the same time it was predicted that the development would make the Allatoona area "the leading recreational center in Georgia."

Those who sponsored these predictions said they referred only to the recreational features of the development and that the estimates of new money took no account of the enormous opportunities for new business and industrial enterprises that will naturally result from the Allatoona development, with its estimated 110,000 kilowatt hours of electric power.

Such enterprises, representing the creation of new wealth in the area, they said, would run into many millions of dollars each year.

The occasion was a meeting here of delegations of leading citizens representing the north Georgia counties to discuss with Army engineers the recreational possibilities of the area. Col. Mark M. Boatner, district engineer, Mobile, presided.

Col. Boatner announced that the Army engineers will soon advertise for bids of the Allatoona dam, a $17,500,000 project.

"We are getting our final plans ready," he said, "and by March 1 we expect to ask for bids. We want to get busy and we are clearing our desks for action."

A spirit of enthusiastic unity marked the meeting. Delegations from Bartow, Polk, Cobb, Floyd, Cherokee, Fulton and Whitfield counties all spoke in favor of the maximum development of the area's recreational facilities. No one raised a voice of dissent.

Two state parks—one for whites and the other for Negroes—on the shores of the new lake are among the suggestions advocated.

In urging quick decisions on the recreational aspects of the development, Col. Boatner said: "We want action. The people in Washington are pushing us for our report."

To meet this situation, Charles A. Collier, vice president of the Georgia Power Company, suggested the appointment of a small executive committee to represent the people of the area in later conferences with Col. Boatner and his associates.

It was Collier who made the estimates about the enormous amount of new money that development of the recreational features of Allatoona will bring into the area.

Collier, in pledging 100 per cent co-operation from his company, said: "There is nothing else that you can do that will bring so much new money every year into your area."

In line with this suggestion, the delegations representing the four counties directly affected by the development met later and formed the Allatoona Area Planning Committee, with two members from each of the four counties and one member from the state at large.

Members of that committee are: Floyd county, John R. Hornaday and Jack McDonough; Cobb county, George H. McMillan, county commissioner, and F. J. Kienel; Cherokee county, J. H. Brazwell and Eugene A. McCanless; Bartow county, Robert W. Knight and John W. Dent; representing the state at large, Lee Trimble, director of the tourist panel of the Georgia Industrial and Development Board. Secretary will be Paul G. Harber, director of the Cartersville Chamber of Commerce.

Delegations from the various counties authorized this committee to represent the area in conferences with the Army engineers.

"This recreation development," said Collier, "will bring from 2,000,000 to 3,000,000 people as a minimum estimate each year into this area. It will be one of the biggest things that ever happened to Georgia."

ALLATOONA

Col. Boatner revealed that plans for the Allatoona dam are so far advanced that he has already engaged a resident engineer to supervise the job. This engineer, Charles A. Jackson, with 45 assistants, will establish his headquarters here, Boatner said.

Various delegations emphasized Col. Boatner with the desirability of building sub-impoundment dams to keep the parts of the lake at a constant level for recreational purposes.

Judge William A. Ingram, Cartersville, presented a report urging such a sub-impoundment dam on the Etowah near where U. S. 41 now crosses the river.

F. J. Kienel, Acworth, urged a similar dam on Proctor's creek, and Eugene A. McCanless, Canton, spoke in favor of another such dam near Canton.

Judge Ingram said that the dam he proposed would maintain a constant level lake of 3,300 acres. (The total area of Allatoona lake at high water will be 20,300 acres.)

Both Kienel and McCanless, speaking for their sections, agreed to abide by the decisions of the engineers.

Col. Boatner said he was sympathetic with proposals for such sub-impoundment dams, but that the determining factors would be cost and how these dams would affect the volume of electric power produced at the main dam.

To meet the latter objection, Eugene McCanless, Canton, said he would sponsor an immediate engineering survey to prove that the loss of electric power at the main dam would be very small as a result of the subimpoundment dams to create the proposed constant-level lakes.

"The increased volume of business that these constant-level lakes would create," said McCanless, "would more than compensate the government for the loss in the volume of electric power. In other words, the government would gain more than it would lose."

After a luncheon at the Hotel Braban at which the local chamber of commerce entertained the visiting delegations, Col. Boatner and his associates remained here for the night to confer with interested citizens.

Spokesmen for the various county delegations included: Judge C. C. Pittman, Cartersville, in charge of arrangements for the meeting; W. C. Henson, Cartersville, who introduced the speakers; McCanless, Canton, for Cherokee county; Mrs. Catherine Knight, Cartersville, for the P.-T. A.; Kienel, Acworth; Roy K. Willard and David J. Booth, for the U. S. Fish and Wildlife Service; John R. Hornaday, editor of the Rome News-Tribune, representing the Alabama-Cooca Development Association; George H. McMillan, county commissioner, Cobb county; Stafford Brooks, Whitfield county; E. L. Beach, of the flood control section of the soil conservation service; M. M. Dejarnette and L. M. Parks, of the state department of health; Arthur Neal, county commissioner of Bartow county; Milton Fleetwood, editor of the Cartersville New - Tribune; Fred Starr, Dalton, representing the 11 counties in the Scenic Northwest Georgia Committee; H. W. Oliver, of the state parks department; H. M. Crane, city manager of Cartersville, and L. C. Hulsey, Rockmart, representing the Polk county delegation.

Beatrice Morgan spoke on behalf of the Negroes of Bartow county and urged the establishment of the proposed state park for Negroes.

F. F. Gatlin and R. O. Harris, civilian assistants to Col. Boatner, were present, as were Maj. J. T. DeJarnette and Maj. K. B. Simmons, representing Brig. Gen. James B. Newman, division engineer of the corps of Army engineers, Atlanta.

Beatrice Morgan spoke on behalf of the Negroes of Bartow county and urged the establishment of the proposed state park for Negroes.

F. F. Gatlin and R. O. Harris, civilian assistants to Col. Boatner, were present, as were Maj. J. T. DeJarnette and Maj. K. B. Simmons, representing Brig. Gen. James B. Newman, division engineer of the corps of Army engineers, Atlanta.

Etowah Development

WASHINGTON, Jan. 30.—(AP)—The National Park Service is recommending large-scale recreational development along the Etowah river in Georgia in connection with the building of the Allatoona dam near Cartersville.

Thomas J. Allen, regional park service director, advised Rep. Tarver, Democrat, Georgia, Wednesday his agency recommended establishment of a state park, a Negro park, community-sponsored picnicking, boating and swimming areas, and group camping sites.

Under plans suggested by Allen, each park would contain a museum, amphitheater, vacation cabin colony, boat docks, bathing facilities and picnicking areas. Also proposed for the state park are a lodge, fisherman's village and game area.

The proposed museums would include geological, archeological and nature-study exhibits of the immediate section.

Limited day use facilities are recommended convenient to Cartersville and Canton, whose citizens, Allen said, "should be prepared to contribute in some form to obtaining these special facilities."

FUN FOR MILLIONS

Etowah Playground Project Group Named

Recreation Area, Hour's Drive From Atlanta, Would Be Largest of Its Kind in Georgia

By HUGH PARK, Journal Staff Writer

CARTERSVILLE, Ga., Jan. 31.—"If I'm dreaming," said Mrs. Fred Knight, Cartersville Parent-Teacher Association representative, "I hope no one will ever wake me up."

Mrs. Knight was one of the two women present at the meeting of approximately 150 northwest Georgians gathered here to prepare the greatest playground that Georgia adults and children have ever known. She had heard speakers draw fine pictures of the $17,400,000 dam on the Etowah River; of cabins lining the clear blue waters of its lake; of quail-hunters trailing their dogs in its game preserves, and of boats and black bass, and tired people getting a rest from the city. But so far they were only pictures.

All the people present had seen the indecision, yet they wanted to please Colonel Mark Boatner, district Army engineer from Mobile, and didn't know exactly how to go about it.

"We Need a Committee"

For two hours they watched the fate of the vast playground—thousands upon thousands of acres affording forgetfulness and health—waver until Charles A. Collier, vice president of the Georgia Power Company, got up and said, "Colonel Boatner, what we need here is the appointment of a committee—brains, if you please—to work with you, secure funds if they are necessary, and see that this recreational project is realized."

Funds for the dam and the 20,000-acre lake already have been approved by Congress. The bids will be advertised sometime in March. The question now was the playground, a site within an hour's drive of Atlanta and one which could serve 1,000,000 Georgians alone.

The section that the dam on the Etowah and the recreation area would cover possesses more varied, interesting history than any other in the state. Along its twisting, hill roads Sherman marched to the sea. Near Cartersville rises the Etowah Mounds, built before Christopher Columbus was born, and the second largest in the United States. Swinging around the mounds is a moat, 25 feet deep and 100 feet wide. The warrior Cherokees drove out an Indian tribe at the beginning of the sixteenth century and the vanquished told them that the mounds had been built long before by a people they themselves had conquered and who had lived in northwest Georgia between 1,000 and 1,400 A. D.

The Smoky Mountain Park, in Tennessee and Carolina, is near no such thickly populated area as the Georgia project. But in 1940 four and a half million persons visited the Smoky Mountain Park. Mr. Collier conservatively estimated that 2,000,000 tourists and Georgians would camp in the Allatoona preserves annually. If they stayed only overnight, that would mean a $10,000,000 income.

Boatner Is Receptive

Colonel Boatner was receptive to all the suggestions for drawing tourists and for providing recreation for the people from Rome on the west, Dalton on the north, Gainesville on the east and Atlanta on the south.

But they needed a definite plan, the colonel and other spokesmen emphasized again. As representatives from Bartow, Cherokee, Cobb, Whitfield, Polk and Fulton thought this over, a heroic Negro woman, representing the Negroes of northwest Georgia, read a paper to the assemblage in a slightly tremulous voice, detailing to them what the Negro park, part of the project, but separate from the white, would do for Negro youth.

"It would be a wholesome place for them to go," she said in conclusion. The delegates applauded her as she went to her seat, and an elderly Negro preacher, one of the three Negroes present, thanked the Government and the white men present for the privilege of appearing before them.

Cartersville city manager, Herbert Crane, put the motion that a permanent committee be set up to work out the details of the recreational project with the engineers. Some of the delegates proposed delay, but then slowly, the session swung toward acting now.

Committee Named

Appointed to the new Allatoona Area Planning Committee were: From Floyd County, John R. Hornady and Jack McDonough; Cobb, George H. McMillan and F. J. Kienel; Cherokee, J. H. Bagwell and E. A. McCanless, and Bartow, Robert W. Knight and John W. Dent. These four counties are the ones most directly affected by the Allatoona project.

Lee S. Trimble, of the tourist panel of the Georgia Agriculture and Industrial Board, was named a representative from the state at large, and Paul T. Harber, secretary of the Cartersville Chamber of Commerce, was named secretary of the committee. Mr. Dent and Mr. McMillan were elected cochairmen.

TO THE UNITED STATES ENGINEERS
Allatoona Project
Cartersville, Georgia

Gentlemen:

Representing the Negro citizens of Cartersville and Bartow County, we are grateful for the opportunity to present to you this request for a portion of the recreational area which is planned in connection with the construction of a power dam on the Etowah River in the proximities of Cartersville, Georgia, or any subsidiary dam which may be desirable.

Such a facility will provide and insure the much needed improvement of health for our people in this region and thereby contribute to the general health and welfare of the entire region. It will also promote the development of high moral character in providing wholesome outdoor recreation.

There are 4209 Negroes in Bartow, 6280 in Cobb, 1298 in Paulding, and 897 in Cherokee Counties. Within a 50-60 miles radius of Cartersville there are 172,305 Negroes. Many of these would consider it a privilege to use these proposed facilities.

We therefore beg to submit the following request for:

A minimum of 50 acres of land with a shore of 3520 yards along the lake formed by whatever water impoundment provides the more desirable recreational area if and when such is constructed, together with surfaced access roads, water and sanitary facilities; camp sites for 4-H Clubs, New Farmers of America, Boy and Girl Scouts, and any other properly supervised camping organizations; also picnic areas and equipment; parking areas; boat docks; and space for commercial enterprises to the extent necessary to meet the reasonable needs of the public and conducted by Negro concessioners to whom leases are granted.

We are sure that all of our people in this region will be deeply grateful for your generous consideration.

We thank you again for this privilege.

Respectfully yours,

Honorable W. C. Henson
Cartersville
Georgia

Dear Mr. Henson:

I am deeply grateful to you for your letter of February 2. I am more and more convinced that one outstanding leader in every community of our region who has the moral courage manifested by you can do more to produce desirable human relations than any other factor in the community. All of us here in the office were quite pleased with the news article concerning the reception accorded the presentation of Mrs. Morgan.

I have consulted Dr. Johnson, Director of the Southern Regional Council, concerning the suggestion in the last paragraph of your letter, and he wishes me to assure you that we shall be happy to work on this matter. There are some Negro leaders in this community who are able and willing to give this project every consideration since it is so close to Atlanta. If I do not hear from you to the contrary, we will go ahead and work up some definite plans with the technical advice of Mr. Roy Wood of the United States Fish and Wild Life Service, whose office is here. Please make any suggestions which you would consider valuable to us.

With best wishes for your continued success, I am

Dear Sir:

Your favor of the 1st received for which I thank you,

A fine start has been made in the creation of recreational facilities in connection with the Allatoona project, but some definite plans and specifications should be drawn and submitted to the U. S. engineers. The meeting was held here on the 30th of Jan. for this object, but most of the suggestions were of a general nature and need working into detailed plans. One of the best outlines made according to some who were there was the one submitted by the colored people here. This report was read by Mrs. Beatrice Morgan. I presided and introduced her as Mrs. J. S. Morgan and so far as I know it is the first time a Negro here. has been introduced as Mrs. to a white audience, ~~xxxxxxxxxxxxxxxx~~

Mr. Wood came after you ~~came~~ were here and met with them and helped them work out their plan. If the Regional Council or some other organization or group of organizations in Atlanta could get together and work out detailed suggestions and submit it to the engineers by March the first I think it would be of mat rial aid to them in providing badly needed places for colored people. Many things have to be considered, the topography of the land, the rise and fall of the water, etc. and only a competent staff can do all this.

Yours very truly,

W. C. Henson

Our dear Dr. Trigg:

Send copy

We are sure that you read in both the Atlanta Constitution and the Atlanta Journal about the prestige given the Negro committee on the occasion of the Allatoona Dam Project meeting here in Cartersville, January 30. We are proud to tell you that our own home paper spoke of us in a more fitting manner. It will interest you to know the reading of our report by Mrs. B. E. Morgan was applauded more -- far more than any other report rendered.

Deeply sensitive of the part you played in making our report out standing, significant and impressive, our committee takes this method to express to you a whole-hearted appreciation for the help rendered. We want that you should know this kindness and interest will ever be ours to remember and cherish.

We pledge you our fondest hope and eager anticipation that the Southern Regional Council's work will be crowned with success by the contribution you are able to make.

We are very kindly yours,

Dear Dr. Moore:

I wish to thank you for your letter of February 4 which was finally received here on February 13, and for the letter of February 7 from you, Mrs. Morgan, and Professor Morgan. May I assure all three of you that it was a pleasure to help you. I think you had the opportunity to do a wonderful job, and I am sure you did it well. Would you be kind enough to send me a clipping from the Cartersville paper which reported the proceedings at the hearing?

I am now trying to interest some Atlanta people in the project in order that they may be ready to express their wishes on March 1.

It was a pleasure to meet you and Professor Morgan and to see the fine spirit which you are putting into community affairs. I am sorry that I missed Mrs. Morgan, and hope to meet her on some subsequent visit to Cartersville.

With kindest good wishes, I remain

Negro Citizens Offer Proposal At Recent Meet

Give Reasons To Col. Mark Boatner Why They Should Be Included

Among the interesting proposals submitted to the delegates assembled in Cartersville last week to study the recreational aspects of the Allatoona dam was one presented by the colored citizens of Bartow county.

Read to the group by Beatrice Morgan, president of the Georgia Congress of Parents and Teachers for colored schools, the submitted proposal not only contains some illuminating facts, but likewise it is evident of some careful, detailed study on the part of local colored citizens.

The Tribune-News takes pleasure in printing the report in full below:

We favor the establishment of a sub-impoundment on the Allatoona Creek which would provide a stable water area and thereby make it possible to achieve the greatest recreational benefits from the project. Should this sub-impoundment be constructed, it is requested that the recreational are mentioned in this project be located on this sub-impoundment.

We are sure that all of our people in this region will be grateful for your generous consideration.

We thank you again for this privilege.

Respectfully yours,

Bernice Parks, President Summer Hill Parent-Teacher Association; Beatrice Morgan, President Georgia Congress of Parents and Teachers; J. F. Anderson, President, Cartersville Progressive Civic League; J. S. Morgan, W. R. Moore, Rev. Rosamond Kay, Committeemen.

Need stable water surface if area is to provide adequate recreation possibilities.
Need sub impoundment - if & when it comes - 3-5 mile front on lake.
Wait until lake forms before building anything.
Any building must be 11 ft. higher than (45 year) flood run.

Dear Sir:

I am mailing you a map of the Allatoona Dam Area and trust it reaches you all right.

There is one suggestion I might make, something likely that has occurred to you, and that is a site should be selected where the land is steep for if it is located on a comparatively level or rolling s pot, when the eater recedes it will leave a wide space of muddy lands, useless for recreation. The steeper it is the less trouble this will give. My information is that the water will vary considerably between seasons and a place to be used for swimming, boating, etc. should be on high steep hill sides.

Yours very truly,

START OF THE ALLATOONA DAM—Army engineers set off first blast of dynamite to clear the foundation chosen for Allatoona dam, on the Etowah river, near Cartersville. Here, a huge 10-ton overhanging boulder, relic of a pre-historic age, goes skyward. Engineers started the work on the north side of Allatoona gorge, in exact center of the site of the dam. Here the gorge reaches up more than 350 feet from the water.

Allatoona Dam Project Launched In Bartow by Blasts on the Etowah

By WELLINGTON WRIGHT,
Constitution Staff Writer.

CARTERSVILLE, Ga., Feb. 18. There was noise enough to awaken even the slumbering spirit of the Cherokee nation as Army engineers Monday set off a blast to signify the beginning of work on the foundation for the Allatoona dam, on the Etowah river, five miles from here.

The first charge of dynamite blew a great gash in the north side of Allatoona gorge, directly in the center of where the great dam will rise. A second charge five minutes later blew a mighty 10-ton overhanging boulder into high-flying fragments.

Thus the corps of Army Engineers began work on the $17,400,000 project which will dam up the swiftly flowing waters of the Etowah river and tame them to the peaceful uses of men. This dam, when completed, will eliminate floods in the Etowah valley and will do much to bring the waters of the Coosa-Alabama system of rivers under control. Also, it will ultimately furnish 110,000 kilowatt hours of electric power. In that manner have the Army engineers begun to assert their power over the Etowah river, the river of song and story, the river of the Cherokees . . .

Under the direction of John S. Webster, assistant resident engineer at the dam, with headquarters here, workmen prepared for the blasts on the north side of the gorge. Then, these plans completed, the official party, including members of the press, had to go to the south side to witness the explosions. The distance across the gorge is about 700 feet, but the party had to travel six miles by rough road to get there!

At 12:15 p. m., the party arrived at the south side site directly opposite the scene selected for the explosions. While the photographers were setting up their apparatus, Webster waved a handkerchief. A man on the other side waved a handkerchief in return.

"All set?" asked Webster of the photographers.

On receiving an affirmative answer, he waved his handkerchief again. And then everybody waited . . .

With a roar that echoed and re-echoed through the valley, part of the north side of the gorge blew out, throwing dirt and rock all the way across the river and mushrooming a huge mass of black smoke towards the sky.

Five minutes later, promptly at 12:30 p. m., Webster waved his handkerchief again . . . and the wait was not long this time . .

For in a few seconds seemed as the entire north side of the mountain was going up in smoke. When the smoke cleared away, the mountain was still there, but the huge boulder, a relic of a far-off age, was no more.

The swiftly moving waters of the Allatoona gorge didn't know what to make of all this commotion. They churned and lashed themselves into a fury. But they still flowed swiftly, flowing on forever to an age-old destiny.

And three years from now?

Well, then the waters of the Etowah river will flow on as usual, but always under the reins of harness made by man—still a river of might and power, but a river of peace and majesty. When the Army engineers complete their job at Allatoona, that will be the E owah!

The dam itself will be a structure with an up-stream curve anchored by keystones into the solid bedrock underneath the river. It will be 400 feet wide at the base, will rise 184 feet above the river's bed, and will have an overall length of 1,020 feet. At high water, it will make a lake of 20,300 acres. More than 500,000 cubic yards of concrete will go into the dam.

The work today is directly under the supervision of the Army engineers. On the side which they have selected, a private contractor will erect the dam. The engineers will advertise the contract by March 1 and let the contract by April 1.

In order to make access to both sides of the gorge less difficult, the engineers have already begun to construct two three-mile access roads from U. S. 41, one road on each side of the river. These will have a concrete bed 20 feet wide, and will have the capacity of carrying the heaviest equipment now in use on such structures as the dam.

Many of Webster's aides in the Cartersville office of the engineers were present at site of the dam Monday. They included Ralph E. Crombie, chief administration assistant; L. W. Swindle, in charge of blasting operations; Edgar Malone, construction superintendent; R. L. Saylor Jr., of the Mobile district office; Leonard Roth, of the Atlanta office of the Army engineers; Howard C. Cole, in charge of road construction, and most of the 175 employes now in the local office of the engineers corps.

Webster, assistant resident engineer, is a graduate of the University of South Carolina and is a native of Orangeburg, S. C. Until recently, he was stationed in the Mobile office.

Construction of the dam, with the huge lake that it will create, will make necessary the relocation of U. S. Highway 41, from below Acworth to five miles above Cartersville. This work will cost about $3,000,000. Congress has already appropriated the funds to pay for these relocations.

A little more than a million dollars had been spent on the project before the war, mainly for plans and specifications and relocating the Nashville, Chattanooga and St. Louis Railway tracks.

Dear Colonel Henson:

Please accept my thanks for the excellent advice in your letter of February 16; also the map which came in the same mail and your letter of February 18 with the description of the Negro recreational area. I have had an opportunity to talk with Mr. Booth of the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, and also Mr. Oliver of the Georgia State Park Service. Everybody seems to be very enthusiastic about the whole idea, and I am helping a group of Negroes in Atlanta draw up a statement which will be sent to the Engineers.

We are all deeply indebted to you for your generous interest and assistance. If Dr. Johnson were in the city I am sure he would join me in wishing you many years of the success which comes to those who do not fear to venture.

Yours very truly,

Dear Sir:

For your information the following paragraph is taken from a report to our Committee made by one of the members, O. H. Monroe. Mr. Monroe is an engineer who helped make the Allatoona Survey. It appears to me that this is a good suggestion and one that your group might adopt.

AREA 2. NEGRO RECREATIONAL AREA.

This area lies along the left bank of the Etowah River down stream from its intersection with Little River. It should provide, in general, facilities similar to thoserecommended for Area 1. It could be reached from the Atlanta-Cartersville Highway via Acworth and would thus serve best the greater part of its patrons who would come from the Atlanta area. Land embraced within lots and parts of lots 389, 390, 402, 403, 461, 462, 463, 474, and 475 in the 21st district and 2nd section of Cherokee County, Georgia, should be ideally situated.

These lots contain 40 acres of land each and measure 1420 feet each way.

Yours very truly,

W. C. Henson

ROME, March 6.—(AP)—More than 600,000 cubic yards of earth have already been excavated from the site of the Allatoona dam, Col. Charles A. Jackson, chief engineer, told members of the Rome Junior Chamber of Commerce.

The dam is expected to be completed within 1,170 contract days, or about July 7, 1949. The project eventually will employ between 500 and 1,000 northwest eorgians.

The 180-foot dam structure will 'ack up water for a 23-mile long lake.

Dear Mr. Alexander:

This is to remind you that I have not forgotten your kindness in making valuable suggestions concerning the relationships of the citizens of Atlanta to the Allatoona Recreation Project.

The U. S. Army Engineer is waiting for approval from Washington before it will be possible to give out definite information. He has promised to meet with the interested group as soon as this final step has been taken.

I will let you know about it as soon as possible.

TO: Dr. George S. Mitchell

SUBJECT: The Allatoona Project

FROM: Harold L. Trigg

DATE: August 28, 1947

The office files will show the progress made thus far in securing accommodations for Negroes in the park area on the Allatoona Lake near Cartersville. Thus far, my conferences have been with Mr. Roy Woods, chief of the wild life division of the National Park Services, and Major J.T. DeJarnette who was with the army egineers, (Atlanta National Building, 50 Whitehall Street, S.W.) Major DeJarnette is no longer the recreational officer with the Army Engineers. He has been replaced by Mr. Frances Guscio. Any further negotiations will be with him, since he will plan the recreational areas at Allatoona.

I was asked to suggest a committee of Negroes to advise with the recreation director, in the planning. They are: Mrs. A. Louise Taylor, Mr. W. R. Cochrane, Mr. T. M. Alexander, Mr. Menelik Jackson, and Mr. Jake Henderson.

Dear Will:

The "ground breaking" letters to Mr. Wright, Mr. Dabbs, and Mr. Johnson are being prepared by my secretary.

Their home addresses are: Mr. Guy B. Johnson, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, North Carolina; Mr. Marion Wright, "Top Knot," Linevills Falls, North Carolina; and Mr. James M. Dabbs, Mayesville, South Carolina.

As yet, we don't know who will be here for the Board meeting. Why don't you write Mr. Williams at 3320 Gloucester Road, Richmond, Virginia, and ask him.

Mrs. Tilly, as far as I know, does not have a meeting this month. She had one the last of September and will have a regional meeting at Clark College, November 5 and 6.

How are things in Winston-Salem? It's pleasant here. We didn't even get rain from Gracie. However, the place I spent my vacation this summer was hard hit. We haven't heard anything yet.

Don't worry about the overhead for the introduction letters. I think the Council can make that investment in you.

Hope to see you soon. The staffers have asked about you.

Sincerely,

John Constable

Southern Regional Council, Inc.

Dear John,

We are "hurricaning" it up here right now, but the thesis is still "sloshing" through toward its watery grave in the cold archives of Emory University's Library.

I need your expert assistance!

Marion A. Wright, J. M. Dabbs, and Guy B. Johnson occupy conspicuous places on my list of people whom I should talk with before the thesis is finished. I hope to interview each of them at their respective homes the week of October 12-17. Would you write them a "ground breaking" note so that they will know that my request for an interview rests on legitimate grounds? The actual arrangements for the "chats" will be handled by me and tailored to the schedules of Wright, Dabbs, and Johnson.

I believe that Mrs. Tilly has a workshop somewhere in October. Could you furnish me the date and place? Will Paul Williams be in Atlanta for the annual meeting of the Board? A talk with him would be very valuable for me.

Recently, I wrote Lillian Smith a letter of inquiry about an article she wrote for Common Ground in 1944 in which she "took issue" with the Council's "then" stand on segregation. As yet no reply, but just wanted to keep you informed of what I am doing in case anything "pops up" at your place about my letter to her.

Lastly: if "boss" Alexander will keep a record of the cost of envelopes, postage, and secretarial time on the above requested letters of introduction, I shall be happy to reimburse the Council (with interest) when I get to Atlanta in mid-October.

Sincerely yours,

Dear Will:

Thanks for your letter and the entertaining and instructive outline of the thesis. As an old hand at diapers, as well as SRC, I admire your persistence.

I will look forward to receiving the draft whenever acts of God permit and will try to give it a prompt reading. We are not merely interested in such favorable judgments as you may bring yourself to announce, but more important, we expect to profit from your analytical comments and criticisms.

With all good wishes for a speedy and successful delivery,

Dear Mr. Fleming,

By my reckoning it has long since past the time when I should have given you some accounting of what is supposed to be a simple Master's thesis. Here it is!

In between the diapers, there is massed in a neat little stack on my kitchen table about two hundred pages of the Council's history. Enclosed you will find an outline and commentary thus far.

As you see, I have to "polish and shine" some before it will be finally done. And the final chapter of my conclusions, which I am sure will be worthless, must nevertheless, be penned with a great degree of care.

The agreement between us has stood and still stands that you will read the finished form. There will be no rush when it gets to you (probably the latter part of February--but I don't promise a certain date), so I hope that you will feel free to make very critical comments and suggestions about it.

Next Monday, February 1, I start classwork at the University of North Carolina, so it will probably be spring holidays before I can pay you nice people a visit.

Good luck in all your many endeavors!

Sincerely yours,

William C. Allred, Jr.

This Thesis Goes Something Like This:

Chapter I - "Background" - sketchy story of the Commission on Interracial Cooperation, its demise, the Durham-Atlanta-Richmond-Atlanta meetings, through the chartering of the Council in January, 1944.

Chapter II- "Toward The South of The Future" - a too-lengthy chapter about some of the thinking which went into the make-up of the Council, question of segregation in early years, attempt of the interracial movement as represented in the CIC and SRC to wrestle its way from paternalism to to equality in attitude toward Negro, to espousal of aim for desegregated society, Supreme Court, down to 1959 statement.

Chapter III- "Policy and Structure" - basically a rehash of Odumesque concept of regional council, info from Odum's papers about failure of attempt; emphasis on more mechanical aspects -- i. e., organizational charts, state emphasis between 1954-1957, broadening central functions since 1957, although keeping strong ties with the states.

Chapter IV - "Central Program" - oh boy, the killer! Includes the following parts: (a) Women's work (b) Work with Labor (c) Interagency Cooperation (d) Foreign Visitors (e) Information Program (f) Consultants Service (g) the Southern Leadership Project -- little more than you put in the annual report -- I'll be glad to leave it out! You can read it and see! Also have a tail-end section (h)Notes on a Decade in which an attempt is made to catch some of the day-to-day occurrences program-wise which make the SRC or any human relations organization what it is.

Chapter V - "State Program" - A fair picture of state efforts from 1944-about 1958.

Chapter VI - "Financial" - Ups and downs, low to lower, high to higher-you lived it!

Chapter VII- "Leadership" - This has not been written yet. I may leave it out for most of the important people are caught up in the program chapter. Final decision rests with Emory advisor.

Chapter IX - "Conclusion" - a twister. An attempt to combine praise and attacks; looks as if it may have to be split into two small chapters--my summary has to come some where.

Dear Will:

This is just a word of acknowledgement of your thesis. I have read it and am deeply impressed by the thoroughness of your research and skill and accuracy with which you have written it up. I can readily appreciate how much work went into it, for I know something about the files with which you had to work.

I do have some corrections and suggestions, many of them of a minor sort. But I will save them until we are ready to return the thesis to you. I want all of our principal professional staff members to read it, and it's already begun to circulate among them. I have emphasized to them your stipulations that they give you in writing their reactions and suggestions.

You will be hearing from me again before too long.

Dear Will:

Here, after further delay and more apologies, are some specific comments on your thesis. As you perhaps know, we have been in the throes of moving since I talked to you on the telephone, which added to the frustration of my good intentions.

Let me repeat what I wrote you some weeks ago -- namely, that the thesis is a remarkably accurate and perceptive treatment accomplished against great odds. We are pleased and appreciative, of course, by the accolades you have bestored on SRC and its staff. I must admit that I found myself wishing that your thesis might have been done later, covering the period from 1957 onward. This reflects my personal bias and lack of modesty, but I do feel that for a variety of reasons SRC's organizational, administrative, and program performance has entered a more mature phase in the last few years. This is by no means merely attributable to the virtues of the Executive Director -- much as I would like to think so -- but to the acquisition of some very able new staff members and to the availability of new funds with which to realize many a longstanding aim.

As I pointed out in the attached memo, you will be hearing further from Paul Rilling (on state councils)and Paul Anthony (on finances). Meanwhile, I am returning your thesis separately by registered mail.

Many of my comments deal with very minor points, a few with major questions of interpretation. You are free to ignore all of them except one -- that relating to Hazel Brannon Smith. If, as you revise the thesis, we can be of any further help, don't hesitate to call on us. In any case, we hope to have a visit from you one of these days in our new offices.

Cordially,

MEMORANDUM September 16, 1960

To: Mr. Will Allred

From: Harold C. Fleming

Re: MANUSCRIPT.

P. 1, Par. 2:

John J. Eagen should be John J. Eagan.

P. 55, Pars. 1, 2:

The jump from the Ford Foundation to the Fund for the Republic, not explained here, might be confusing. A word of explanation inserted would help the reader.

P. 56, Last Par.:

"the region's only human relations agency" is not really accurate. There are others, such as the Southern Conference Educational Fund, Highlander Folk School, American Friends Service Committee, the Urban League, and so on.

SRC may be described as the oldest, largest, or, if one thinks so, the most effective organization of its kind working in the regional level.

P. 60-61:

The "executive session" has not automatically included the Executive Director. It consists of Committee members only, unless they choose to call in the Executive Director, which they frequently do. Although it has seldom happened, they may choose to call in some other staff member for private discussion.

P. 63, Footnote 42 (and again P. 156, Footnote 23):

These footnotes are somewhat misleading. The reason why Fleming bore the burden of the discussion and Mitchell didn't say much is readily explained. Mitchell had already submitted his resignation. Fleming was the next senior staff member and, at the Annual Meeting, became Director-Elect. The new orientation, as presented, was Fleming's program and the basis on which he accepted the appointment as Director. Under these circumstances, it was only logical that Mitchell accede to Fleming and the other remaining staff members.

P. 67:

The chart has one minor inaccuracy. The research assistant works directly and exclusively under the direction of the research director. There is also a research clerk in the same category.

P. 72, Par. 2:

The description of the "trickle down" approach is good as far as it goes, but it puts too much emphasis on persuasion. Our information is frequently beamed at leaders and situations where hard practical choices have to be made under the pressure of Negro protest, court decisions, and other national pressures. In these cases, the effort is to present the kind of facts and analyses that will influence their choice in what we regard as a positive direction. For example, in a school situation, this might include documentation of the inadequacy of private schools as substitutes for public schools, the economic damage of school closings, the success of school desegregation elsewhere, and any one of a dozen other kinds of material designed to counter segregationist propaganda and encourage desegregation.

P. 76, First Par.:

"An Honest Answer in the Civil Rights Controversy" was not intended to indicate that the Civil Rights Committee's report was concerned only with equal rights and not desegregation. Some of the recommendations of the report itself clearly called for an end to segregation. The Southern Regional Council statement was only trying to emphasize the neglected fact that equal rights include more than the question of segregation or desegregation. Especially in the economic area the South and the nation would be wise to cooperate in the broadening of job opportunities and improvement of living conditions.

P. 85, Last Par. (Footnote 56):

I think I should point out that the financing of Mrs. Tilly's work is generally proportionate to the financing of other SRC programs.

Out of general funds are paid her salary, travel expenses without limitation, as much clerical and secretarial help as needed, and, of course, the normal overhead expenses of supplies, communication, and the like. It is true that the funds for the special conferences of the Fellowship of the Concerned are handled as a project, but this is consistent with the overall pattern of operation; for example, the entire research program, including salaries, is handled as a special project. The point I am making is that the amount of general funds applied on Mrs. Tilly's program is as great as that spent on any other parallel program of SRC's. And the financing of the conferences is not dependent solely on what Mrs. Tilly can raise by her unaided efforts. SRC accepts as an organizational responsibility the securing of these funds, although the personal flavor of Mrs. Tilly's work makes it highly desirable that she maintain a personal relationship with the continuing donors to the project.

P. 100, Par. 3:

The Tuskegee interagency conference of the Fund for the Republic grantees was not convened by the Fund, but by SRC under a special grant from the Fund.

P. 103, Par. 2:

The mention of Hazel Brannon Smith is the only "security" problem in your whole manuscript. Mrs. Smith is still under attack and pressure from the White Citizens' Councils, and it would be very damaging to her if it were publicly known that she had received aid from liberal and integrationist organizations. So while I must ask that you not mention her by name, it would be all right to refer to her as a deep South woman editor, or in any other way that does not give her identity.

P. 117, Last Sentence:

As far as I can recall, the only criticism of SRC in the Negro press occured during the organization's early years -- that is, before it took a public and unequivocal stand on segregation. At least, I cannot recall any such criticism in recent years. If this squares with your research, you might want to add the phrase "at its beginning" or "some years ago," or some such qualification.

PP. 119 and 120:

Officially, it is "The Field Foundation" rather than the "Marshall Field Foundation" as you have it. The latter is often used and is probably that way in some of our older records.

P. 123:

A small point, but Margaret Price has never billed herself as Mrs. Bem Price in her free lance work. She is a newspaper woman in her own right, having worked for a number of years for the Associated Press in Atlanta.

P. 129, Par. 1:

In the interest of completeness, you might want to add to the list of agencies The American Council on Education and the United States-South African Leader Exchange Program. These two agencies account for a substantial number of the foreign visitors we receive.

P. 132, Par. 2, Last Sentence:

You might want to add the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice, to which SRC has rendered rather frequent service.

P. 149, Par. 1, Last Sentence:

The use of the word "starving" seems to me unduly strong. Certainly SRC was cramped and did not have enough funds to supervise as well as it might have the use of its aid to the state councils. But at no time during the Fund for the Republic aid period was SRC in the dire straits of earlier years, so you might want to consider a less drastic word than "starving."

P. 152, Par. 2:

There is an error here in the date shown for the staffing of the Tennessee Council on Human Relations. At the time George Mitchell wrote to Dave Freeman on May 16, 1955, we thought that the Tennessee Council had hired its staff person, but later we learned that a problem had arisen and that the employment had not taken place. As it turned out, it was several years later that the Tennessee Council acquired a full-time director.

P. 156, Last Sentence:

This is a similar error, in which some of our records may be at fault. Throughout 1958 and 1959 the New Orleans Council was on the verge of being reactivated. Maddeningly, however, the starts turned out to be false ones, and the money budgeted for the New Orleans Council in those years eventually reverted to general funds. I seem to recall that on at least one occasion Fred Routh, in good faith but prematurely, reported to the Executive Committee that the New Orleans Council was reactivated. This is no doubt the source of the misinformation.

P. 157, First Sentence:

The Mississippi Council is, in fact, now defunct. It maintained a paper existence for a year or two after SRC discontinued financial aid, but it eventually ceased to be any kind of entity.

Allred Manuscript - 5.
September 16, 1960

P. 158, Par. 1, Last Sentence:

Since this is attributed to a personal interview with me, I should like to qualify the point a bit. In my opinion, since disaffiliation the state councils on human relations that have survived have become stronger and more effective organizations with a better chance of survival. Within the past year, in almost every case, the fund-raising performance has improved also. At this time, it is probable that at least some of them could and would continue even without financial aid from SRC. Of course, the loss of SRC aid would be a heavy blow for any of them but it would not necessarily mean extinction.

P. 172, First Sentence:

While 1957 was certainly the richest year in the Council's history during the period you studied, it was richest in terms of receipts rather than in terms of income to be used in that year. Of course, the receipts were greatly inflated by the transmittal of the full three-year terminal grant from the Fund for the Republic. Only a fraction of this $200,000 was to be spent in 1957 however. In terms of current income, subsequent years have been richer than 1957.

As you know, audits are very tricky and misleading documents. We have had occasion recently to analyze our income of latter years in a meaningful way. I have asked Paul Anthony to send you a copy of that analysis, as it might modify your own picture of SRC finances. Paul is away just now, but I trust you will receive this shortly.

You might also want to point out in your financial discussion the fact that SRC relinquished its limited fund-raising efforts within the South to the various state councils. Therefore, in a real sense, total funds raised locally by the state councils should be regarded as funds raised for this movement within the South. Looked at in those terms, more money has been raised in the South for this work than at any time in previous history.

P. 178, Par. 3:

As you may know, Dr. Mitchell's quip quoted here is in fact a familiar chestnut in this business. That is to say, it was not original with Dr. Mitchell.

P. 186, Par. 3, Last Sentence:

Dabbs undoubtedly lessened his farm work, but in other respects he is busier than ever. The publishing of his book (another one is about to be published) and his accession to the presidency of SRC involved him in a great many speaking engagements and other activities that have probably kept him busier than his full-time farming once did.

Allred Manuscript - 6.
September 16, 1960

P. 188, Par. 1:

In listing the Negro leaders in the Council, I think it would be only proper to add Dr. Gordon W. Hancock; before his retirement a faculty member at Virginia Union University. Dr. Hancock was one of the most active and influential persons in the formative stage of SRC. Because of age and ill health, he has been inactive for several years.

P. 198-199:

While I am the first to admit the weaknesses of the state council program carried out under the Fund for the Republic's original grant, I do feel that your evaluation of the results is harsher than actual circumstances might warrant. If this is true, as I believe, I am sure that a considerable part of the fault is mine. It is entirely likely that I over-stated the case in our talks. As I have remarked above, the surviving state councils have steadily improved within the last two or three years, and a good case could be made for the argument that the investment in these organizations has yielded, and is still yielding, some valuable returns. More important, the main returns may yet be realized in the future. For example, Kentucky has now established an official state human relations council, and there is little question that this development is in large part the result of the existence and work of the Kentucky Council on Human Relations.

On a point of language, I would also raise the question of describing the state program as making a "neat package" for sale to the Fund for the Republic. In the context, this would suggest that George Mitchell's advocacy of the program was less than sincere. I know you don't intend that, since you perceived that George Mitchell had a deeply held conviction that decentralization was the answer however erroneous that view may look in retrospect.

Paul Rilling, who succeeded Fred Routh as patron of the state councils and was himself director of the Virginia Council, is writing you a separate memo fo dissent from your conclusions here. As one might expect, his views are even stronger than mine, and I will simply let his memo to you stand on its own merits.

Let me make it clear that my disagreement is only one of degree. I think SRC deserved some criticism for its over-optimism and lack of realism in the state council program. But I do think that more has been and will be salvaged than your analysis would suggest.

Considering the heartwarmingly, favorable conclusions you reach about SRC, I regret to have to file any dissent at all on the last section. It might be enough to hope that we can justify the favorable judgments which you have expressed.

Re: Manuscript.

Am quite impressed with the information and understanding concerning finances which have been gotten from SRC materials. It is a thorough job and nothing is incorrect. Would suggest the following additions or further interpretation to the material presented:

1. On page 171 there is the statement, "In the early months of 1957, the central office experienced a financial 'pinch', but a terminal grant from the Fund.....considerably brightened the future." The situation in early 1957 was not a "pinch" but a crisis. The Council entered that year completely unprepared to finance its operation through a normal fund-raising effort such as that which now supports SRC. The period of major support from the Fund for the Republic had not been replaced by a general fund-raising program. There was no sound base of support and, in effect, in one year SRC had to perform the near miracle of financing most of its substantial operation from mainly new sources. During the first months of 1957, for example, the situation was sufficiently grave that a priority schedule of salary payments was established in the event that not all the payroll could be met. It was never necessary to use this schedule but in several instances grants from new sources relieved the situation only by ammatteroof a few days.

   Incidentally, this crisis occurred just as the new director, Harold Fleming, took office. Fleming's major reluctance to accept the position of director was due in part to his concern with the heavy fund-raising requirements of that position and the doubts he held about his abilities in that area. Although the effort and time required has been even more than Fleming feared, he has developed remarkable skills in this area.

2. In an analysis of audits it is necessary to make a distinction between the physical accounting of funds received and spent (the audit) and the program use of funds. Accounting of funds received in a given year does not necessarily indicate the schedule under which those funds may be spent. This is determined by the Council's policy and, more importantly, the requirements of the donor and the agreements made. Thus, for instance, while the Council received a terminal grant of $200,000 from the Fund for the Republic during 1957 this grant was scheduled for use beginning in the last quarter of 1957 (after m the crisis of that year had eased) and for the years 1958, 1959 and 1960. At the end of 1957, the audit for that year reveals that of the grant of $200,000 a balance of $180,475 remained for the next three years. And, of this amount - while there was no binding commitment to do so - it was understood that a substantial portion of these funds would be for aid to state councils if at all possible.

3. In reference to the above, and to the statement on page 172, "...made 1957 the richest year in the Council's history," several modifications might be in order. 1957 was the richest year thus far. In the actual use of funds available, each year since 1957 has been higher than that for the previous year. For instance, excluding the distributed grant from the Fund for the Republic, the following is a schedule of foundation income as used:

1954.....	$ 7,550.00
1955.....	19,150.00
1956.....	38,600.00
1957.....	53,300.00
1958.....	99,600.00
1959.....	183,000.00
1960.....	218,000.00

Thus, to the auditor, 1957 was the richest year of the period covered by the study. In terms of fund-raising effectiveness and program - the more accurate yardsticks for this study - this was a year of crisis, of curtailed budget and expenditures, and was generally well below the level of operation, program expense, and security of the years after 1957.

4. The years 1954-1958 were "rich" years for the Council. But, as is explained in detail in the study, the years 1954-1957 saw a major portion of the Council's funds channeled into the establishment and maintenance of state councils. The distinction should be clear that total funds received and spent during these years is not automatically a reflection of the Council's central program activity. In effect, during these years the Council was two organizations; one (state aid) was wealthy and diminishing, and other (central staff and program) was relatively poor but has grown and expanded considerably each year. Even for the SRC staff, the accounting and auditing of these two heads has proved to be a cumbersome task, difficult to interpret.

5. The over-dependence oneone source of funds (as was SRC's wi with the Fund for the Republic) in essence created the organization as a relatively prosperous one and later seriously threatened its very existance. (And on a smaller scale this situation had existed earlier.) Fleming was aware of this fact -- and impressed by it. Since 1957 he has pursued a policy of building a broader base of support, seeing that the Council is no longer largely dependent on one or two sources of support. A review of the sources of support 1957-60 will reveal that this policy and caution have been successful thus far. This fact might be worth mention in a study of the Council, since it has been a significant factor in fund-raising, budgets, and program since 1957.

The advent of grants from other sources made 1957 the richest year in the Council's history.[38] Although total receipts declined in 1958,[39] investments and savings provided needed resources for stable operations. At the Board's annual meeting in November, the Executive Committee succinctly summarized the financial status by reporting: "Many of you will recall vividly the time, not long past, when our solvency was measured in days, or even hours. Now we can at least discuss our financial needs in terms of the coming year."[40]

[38] Total receipts were in excess of $295,000.

[39] Total receipts were approximately $179,200.

[40] Executive Committee Report, Annual Meeting Minutes, November ____, 1958, p. ____.

During the five "rich" years between 1954 and 1958, the Council received gifts totalling $1,276,772.[41] This was double what it had received in the first ten years of its life. A significant factor in the sudden influx of funds to the organization was the Supreme Court decision of May, 1954. The Council has grown as racial tension has increased in the South. Only the future will answer the riddle of the race problem, but it is a fair guess ~~to speculate~~ that the Council will have the tenacity to be on the scene when the outward walls of the segregation system have completely collapsed.

[41] All figures are compiled by this writer from the official audits of the Southern Regional Council.

This is a graph showing the major sources of the Council's income from 1944 until 1958. From 1944 until 1953 the scale is approximately $2,000 per block. From 1954 until 1958 the scale is approximately $5,000 per block. Orange represents foundation gifts; Green represents Church gifts; Blue represents Labor organization gifts; Purple represents individual gifts. See Appendix A for complete list of donors to the Council.

Since 1954 adequate funds have been available for a greatly expanded program. The largest part of the Fund For the Republic grant was specifically committed to establishing human relations organizations in the Southern states.[35] Under the terms of the grant, each state was required to raise an increasingly larger amount of its funds each year. Whether or not it did so was a factor in determining subsequent appropriations from the central office. The entire three and one half year grant was an effort to start state groups which would be able to exist independently after the outside support had ended.

[35] Virginia, Kentucky, Arkansas, Alabama, Georgia, Florida, Texas, Mississippi, Louisiana, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee. Oklahoma, included in the Council's sphere of operations earlier, was dropped in the request for funds.

Under the Fund For the Republic's grant, the central office received very little in comparison with the state programs. With tension steadily growing in the South over the public school issue, the Council's Atlanta office had increasing burdens on its time and resources. The stiffened resistance to change brought difficulties in the financial programs of the various states, and the Council was forced to reorient its thinking toward continued aid to the state groups after the expiration of the Fund For the Republic's grant.[36]

[36] Minutes Executive Committee, April ___, 1956. George Mitchell contemplated three years of "further modest aid" to some of the states.

In the early months of 1957, the central office experienced a financial "pinch," but a terminal grant from the Fund on May 17, 1957 of two hundred thousand dollars considerably brightened the future prospects.[37]

Dear Harold and Paul,

I can not thank you both enough for your succinct comments in the excellent memoranda you sent. I appreciate your efforts.

Note the following:

(1) The request reference to Hazel Brannon Smith is noted and I will use you suggestion in the matter.

(2) The financial chapter bothered me very much. In so far as monetary matters are concerned, I took to the audits the naivete of a three year old. Paul's comments will help order such confusion as may exist.

(3) My conclusions about the state agencies bothered me also. But I think the solution lies in the fact that my treatment of them is superficial; this arising from the impossibility of studying them at first hand. I eagerly await Paul Rilling's comments.

Being true to some sort of system which I follow, I am settling down to rewrite this thing, cull errors, inculcate your constructive words, and do alot of polishing and smoothing in preparation to send it to the high command at Emory. I am certain that they have long ago given me up as a lost cause.

Thank you again,

Sincerely yours,

Will

INTEROFFICE MEMO

Date July 21, 1960

To: HCF✓ From: PR

Subject: The Allred MS

I have the following comments and suggested corrections:

(1) P. 56, last paragraph. Is it correct to refer to SRC as "the region's only human relations agency working in the field of racial relations"?

(2) P. 62, I don't believe that the two last sentences here make much of a contribution to the analysis. I would not, of course, agree that "the role of advisor, director, coordinator, and breadwinner for the states was lost effort" or that it is necessarily true that "as a result other important aspects of the Central Office's functions were not receiving sufficient attention." I do not believe that SRC assistance to the state divisions was, even in those days, "lost effort." At least the statement is not substantiated herein.

(3) P. 63, last paragraph. The last complete sentence reading: "Since there was no foreseeable aid as great as that from the FFR, no money would be available to aid the state organizations." Is this accurate? At any rate, state aid was not cut off, was it in 1957 or subsequently?

(4) P. 99-100. There is a break in the continuity between these two pages. Some material is evidently missing.

(5) P. 155, last paragraph. I would strongly question the statement that in 1955 "it was evident that the various state directors were engaged in activities primarily concerned with fund-raising." Or the statement at the top of page 156 which says, "By and large the state programs lacked vigor." The statement is too vague to have meaning. I question whether such sweeping subjective evaluations are necessary in a work of this scope particularly when they are not based on any personal study of state programs. Such comments are surprisingly missing in the section dealing with the Consultant Service Program or the Interagency Conference where they could be, it seems to me, even more easily justified.

(6) P. 158. The statement is made, "even at the present, the grant-in-aid system from the Central Office is the major source of income for most of the state organizations." While not technically inaccurate, I believe this statement perhaps is a false impression. If this point needs to be made, I would rather that the figures were reproduced for a recent year. Several of the groups raised more money than they received from SRC last year - for the other groups, the SRC figure would be only slightly over half of their total revenue and this, because of the special grant. The statement gives the impression that they are almost completely supported financially by SRC, which is inaccurate.

(7) P. 159, last paragraph. The statement is made, "They had poured through the Commission on Interracial Cooperation two million dollars down the Southern interracial drain without visiable signs of improvement." A questionable statement, I would think. I realize there were many shortcomings in the old Commission system, but I'm sure it could be proven that some "signs of improvement" were visible in many places during those years. As far as that goes, it would be hard to justify any effort in this field by "visible signs of improvement" deriving specifically from the effort.

(8) P. 198, first paragraph. Here are some more ~~gratitutous~~ gratuitous statements about state groups which I think are not accurate. It is said that, "The tendency is simply to exist rather than actively pursue program which at times would be embarrassing." I think this is undoubtedly true of some groups, at some times, but I would certainly deny that it is "generally" true. The next statement says, "Within the states it seems that opinions, espacially since 1954, has varied widely on a spectrum between an equality ideal back to the 'paternalistic do-gooding' of the Commission on Interracial Cooperation." So far as I know today, all of our groups are agreed on equality goals and ideals. The one exception in the past might have been Georgia.

(9) Page 199, first paragraph, Again, the statement, "Much money, a precious commodity with the Council, had been invested without any appreciable return." I would disagree with this statement. If it means anything, it should be explained and supported. The next few sentences go on to comment specifically on some of the state organizations. I would suggest that the comments are not particularly well informed. To fairly well dismiss the Alabama Council as having gone "underground" and to go on and emphasize Kentucky and Tennessee as groups which have "made the most impact on racial affairs" is, at the least, highly misleading.

I realize that any story of the Council must include an examination of the differing approaches used in relation to field activities and their relative effectiveness. I realize, too, that one man cannot personally study in the field all of the different state groups. What has happened here, however, is that some evaluation has been made based purely on SRC files and interviews with central office staff. The philosophy of the central staff has been effectively absorbed by the author, who has not been exposed to officers or directors in the field or to program activities in the field. The evaluations are superficial; they intend to be based on financial or organizational achievements of state groups rather than on their month-to-month programming.

There is, too, a tendency here as throughout our files to evaluate the state groups against the yardstick that was established back in the early fifties. In other words, there is a tendency to hold the state councils responsible for their inability to meet the past and unrealistic standards of complete self-support. It might be noted that when SRC itself attempted to depend purely on indigenous Southern financial support they had exactly the same sort of trouble and much the same degree as do the state groups. In fact, the amount of money raised by SRC in 1952, when it was primarily dependent on Southern support, was almost exactly the size of the funds raised indigenously by the state councils last year.

MEMORANDUM September 19, 1960

From: Paul Rilling

Re: Allred Manuscript

I do not feel that the thesis presents an adequately objective picture of the role and contributions of the state Councils on Human Relations, particularly in recent years. It would probably be impossible to make such an evaluation without spending some weeks in the field reviewing some of the program activities and achievements of these state and local groups. As it stands, I believe the thesis contains a number of sweeping general conclusions about the state Councils which are not adequately supported or documented in the thesis.

I believe that there have been some substantial changes in the operation of the state Councils and their relationship to the Southern Regional Council since 1958. I don't believe that these changes are adequately reflected in the thesis. I believe, too, that the Councils have been measured to a large degree against the yardstick of financial achievements. It is certainly true that the state groups have not fulfilled the original hope that they would be ultimately self-supporting. I would suggest, however, that it was unrealistic to expect interracial groups in the South to raise sufficient funds within these states to maintain professional staffed operations. It might be noted that when SRC itself attempted to depend purely on indigenous Southern support, the Council had the same sort of trouble and to much the same degree as have the state groups. The amount of money raised by SRC in 1952, when it was primarily dependent on Southern support, was almost exactly the amount raised indigenously by the various state Councils last year.

The state Councils are evaluated primarily on the basis of central files. I realize that this was probably a necessary procedure in view of natural time limitations etc., but I think it must be recognized that there is a difference of emphasis between staff members primarily concerned with the headquarters operation and those who are primarily related to the field operation. The central files of SRC would naturally tend to reflect one emphasis more strongly than the other.

I would specifically question the following statements:

1. On page 62, the statement is made, "...but beyond that point the role of advisor, director, coordinator and bread-winner for the states was lost effort; as a result, other important aspects of the central office's function were not receiving sufficient attention." There may well have been an over-emphasis on state groups at that time, but I believe that use of the term "lost effort" is questionable. I would also question that the emphasis on the state groups necessarily was the cause for insufficient attention to other aspects of the central office's functions. It is not noted here which aspects were not receiving sufficient attention.

2. On p. 155, last paragraph, "It was evident that the various state directors were engaged in activities primarily concerned with fund-raising" in 1955. This may be true, although I would doubt it. At any rate, it is not supported by the quotation from the report of the associate directors for state organizations which follows.

3. In the same general paragraph, but on page 156, the statement is made, "By and large the state programs lacked vigor." There is certainly some truth in this statement but the statement is too sweeping and general to be fair.

4. P. 159, last paragraph, "They had poured through the Commission on Interracial Cooperation two million dollars down the Southern interracial drain without visible signs of improvement." I would not consider this a fair statement. Certainly there were shortcomings in the old Commission set-up, but it did provide needed and valuable channels of communication in a number of Southern communities. There are very few visible signs of improvement from work in the human relations field. Most of the benefits, where they exist, are intangible.

5. P. 198, first paragraph, "Since generally members of the state groups are not subjected to high pressure either to join or to work in the organization, the tendency is simply to exist rather than actively to pursue program which at times would be embarrassing. Within the states, it seems that opinion, especially since 1954, has varied widely on a spectrum between an equality ideal back to the paternalistic 'do-gooding' of the Commission on Racial Cooperation." I believe there has been strong programming in the case of some of the state and local groups which might make this statement an unfair generalization. I believe that during the last two or three years at any rate all of the Councils, with perhaps one exception are clear on their commitment to the goal of equality and desegregation.

6. P. 199, first paragraph. It is said that " By that time, much money, a precious commodity with the Council, had been invested without any appreciable return." Again, I would say, an unfair sweeping generalization which overlooks a number of contributions by some of these groups.

Dear Will:

It's good to have news of you, and I am glad to furnish the further information you requested. Enclosed is a copy of Dr. Hancock's opus about the role of Dr. Odum at the Richmond meeting. As you will see, it reflects Hancock's strong feelings about this meeting and its participants, though I have no reason to doubt the substantive accuracy of his account.

George Mitchell's address is Glencoe, Argyll, Scotland. I don't know whether or not you are informed of the sad physical and mental deterioration which George has suffered within the past year or so; arteriosclerosis, which has affected the brain. I doubt seriously that it's possible at this point to elicit any clear information from him. Fred Routh is at the Michigan State Fair Employment Practices Commission, 900 Cadillac Square Building, Detroit 26, Michigan. Fortunately, at last report Fred is in possession of all his faculties and can be counted on to respond to any request fully and articulately.

I am sorry to hear that the prospect of a Ph.D. has disappeared, but I congratulate you on the serious thought you have given to the implications of this for your M.A. thesis. Your reasoning strikes me as sound and fully justified. Let me repeat again our offer to assist you in every possible way in making this a definitive treatment of SRC during the years you are covering.

The very best regards.

Dear Harold:

Thank you for the copy of Dr. Hancock's letter. My story is about what he mentioned. He mentioned that you had requested that he do a "squib" about Dr. Odum, and that he wrote on Odum's role at the Richmond meeting where the Council idea was adopted. Could I get a copy of that from you?

I am spending the next month or so in typing and polishing a draft of my thesis for Dr. Young at Emory. It is possible that I may want to visit you for a further look at the state reports and papers you have. I have not been satisfied with that part of the thesis. Secretly, I wanted to ride you for both the M. A. and the Ph.D, but a combination of factors, culminating in my making a couple of "C's", have automatically ended my graduate study here. Since there isn't any Ph.D in my future, I hate to finish up the thesis without getting a closer look at the field, for I am fearful that the M. A. thesis will keep anybody else from studying you again for a few years (although I might be wrong). And it is a good story which needs telling.

Since my wife finally realized that I wasn't going to support her, she decided to support me so this gives me some time to shop around for work plus get the M. A. done at last.

Can your secretary send me the addresses of Dr. Mitchell and Fred Routh?

Thanks very much,

Sincerely yours,

Will

Dear Will:

You're a brave man -- and a persistant one. To the extent that it's possible, I'm glad to help, but still suggest that you limit your reporting of finances as much as possible.

For what it's worth, I have made a copy of our analysis of foundation income, 1954 to present. Please note that this is an informal working sheet. The dates shown are when the income was used, not necessarily when received. They would not, therefore, correspond with the audit. For your purposes I believe the only real significance is the rise of income over a period of years -- and the very low foundation income (other than from the Fund for the Republic) for the period 1954-56. Nor does the analysis make any distinction between "general operations" income and that for special projects. You are free to draw any conclusions from the analysis that is possible, but I trust you understand that the analysis as enclosed cannot be formally used by us -- or as a part of your thesis. This is so mainly because it does not correspond to the audit and would inevitably raise questions.

For general guidance, I suspect that you will still find my memo of September 23, 1960 to be of more value for your purposes.

As to the matter of the Fund for the Republic being handled separately in the audits, there are several reasons. Most of the money from the Fund came in several large grants to be spread over a period of years for more than one project or purpose. Thereafter, a separate accounting was required -- to document the receipt of the funds and to indicate the expenditures under the separate headings or "departments." Also, the very nature of the grants, particularly the amounts, indicated a special handling and included special responsibilities of reporting to the Fund. And, as in the case of the enclosed analysis, some separate accounting was desirable to show income in amounts and sources other than the one major income.

If there are more questions, I'll be happy to give them a try. No hurry, but whenever you have finished with it, I would like to have the analysis back. It represents quite a bit of work and would have continuing value to us here.

The Alabama Council is in need of a good director. Are you interested?

Best wishes,

Sincerely,

Dear Paul,

I have just gotten around to the revision of the financial picture and I am finding your memorandum very helpful.

Harold mentioned in his memo to me that you had prepared an analysis of Council income and would send me a copy. I believe the analysis covered the later years since 1954 or so. Probably you drew from this analysis in your comments to me, but I wonder if you could de-classify a copy and send it.

If my memory serves me the grants from the Fund for the Republic are listed separately from just plain foundation aid on the audits. In your memo you listed foundation aid "excluding" the grant from the Fund. Why is not all the foundation aid listed in one spot? A small point but one that puzzles me as I cull my notes.

Thank you very much.

Dear Paul,

I appreciated your warm reception Monday! If George Mitchell and Howard Odom could see your operation now, they would undoubtedly be awed by it all.

It is very easy to see that challenges of the first order face you with the vastly expanded central organization. But you rightly earned the spot by your experience, your continuity with the organization, and your ability to produce results. I wish you much success now.

Dear Mr. Dunbar:

The American Academy of Arts and Sciences has given serious consideration in the last three years to the possibility of undertaking a major study on the Negro in America. The Academy's interest reflects two long-standing concerns: to assist in whatever way it can to encourage research and publication in fields where new scholarly inquiry is required; to develop particularly those studies which rely on contributions from many diverse academic disciplines. The gravity of the racial question in the United States, not to speak of its complexity requires that a substantial effort be made, and that it involve not only those who have already committed themselves to its study but also others whose insights and methods are needed if new and important questions are to be asked in a field whose general contours are certain to be modified in the coming years.

In May, 1962, a Committee of the Academy, under the chairmanship of Professor Oscar Handlin, reported on its discussions of the Negro problem; we quote from Mr. Handlin's report of that date: "There was general agreement that there had been enough scholarly work in the past two decades to justify a fresh evaluation of the role of the Negro in American society. In addition, the international situation, which has placed the issue of color in a new context, the rise of African independence which has significantly modified the attitudes of American Negroes, the postwar technological revolution which has changed the composition of the labor force, and shifts inside the Negro community--all emphasized the utility of a fresh analysis. It was agreed that such an analysis would not only illuminate the situation of an important group in American society, but would also throw light on the effectiveness of various techniques of persuasion and various strategies of reform. The participants were impressed with the fact that Myrdal's American Dilemma was published just as the great period of change started. This impressive work of synthesis was undoubtedly influential; and it has offered a unique opportunity to study not only social change, but also the role of social science in effecting social change. A fresh view of the subject that focused on what has happened since Myrdal's book would measure the important changes of the past twenty years, would point to the directions of probable future development, and might say something useful about the validity of predictions in the social sciences."

We believe that the time has come to consider whether the Academy cannot contribute to the realization of these and other similar objectives. It is for this purpose that we seek your help. Through the generosity of the Carnegie Corporation a grant has been made to the Academy to convene a Planning Committee to inquire into what may be done to advance studies in this vital field, and to map out a prospective issue of DAEDALUS on the Negro in America. We are asking the following persons to serve on the Academy Committee:

Allison Davis	Jean Mayer
Erik Erikson	Robert Merton
John Hope Franklin	Daniel Moynihan
Clifford James Geertz	Talcott Parsons
Oscar Handlin	William Schmidt
Everett Hughes	James Tobin
Edward Levi	James Wilson
Carl Kaysen	Whitney Young

The Committee will meet at the House of the Academy in Brookline on Friday and Saturday, April 10 and 11, beginning with lunch on Friday and extending through dinner on Saturday.

With such a group it will not be necessary to channel the deliberations narrowly. We shall only recall that an analagous effort was made by the Academy five years ago in the field of arms control. The Academy convened at that time men from diverse disciplines whose professional preoccupations touched the field of arms control directly, tangentially, or in some cases almost not at all. Out of their deliberations came one of the most important issues of DAEDALUS that the Academy has published, and a hard-cover book which did much to make the dimensions of the new field obvious. We fully believe that we can accomplish something of the same sort this time.

Do let us know if you can be with us on April 10 and 11. Your presence will matter greatly to our enterprise.

Sincerely,

Hudson Hoagland

Dear Mr. Dunbar:

Mr. Hoagland is absent from the country this week and I am taking this opportunity to answer your letter to him of March 9. Let me simply say that we very much regret that you cannot be with us on April 10-11; we will miss you greatly. Please be assured, however, that we will keep in touch with you, informing you of what happens at these meetings and, hopefully, engaging your interest in whatever follows. With all best wishes.

Sincerely,

Stephen R. Graubard

Dear Mr. Hoagland:

I have your letter of February 27. I am grateful to you for inviting me to the committee meeting, and because of its importance I wish I could attend. The dates, however, duplicate those of a seminar-conference on the Disadvantaged to be held at Tuskegee at which I have already agreed to speak.

Please accept my regrets, and if I can be of any other assistance to you in your deliberations, please call on me.

Sincerely yours,

Dear Mr. Dunbar:

Enclosed you will find a hastily edited transcript of a recent Planning Committee meeting held by the American Academy of Arts and Sciences on the Negro in America. This material is being sent to you for your information only. I would hope that you would find time to read it in the near future and give me the benefit of your opinion about it.

With all best wishes.

In welcoming the group, the Chairman, Mr. Stephen Graubard, presented the purpose of the conference on the Negro American as not merely preparing for an issue of Daedalus, but as an occasion for establishing a consensus concerning the sort of study that might ideally describe and analyze the problems of the Negro in America, both as they exist today, and as, according to a present perspective, one might possibly project events, needs, developments in the next decade. On the invitation of the Chairman, Mr. Parsons then proceeded to present an outline of what he considered problem areas in need of consideration. He listed three main levels of the general problem of the study:

I. The normative level: namely, the moral imperatives and problems and their embodiment in legal forms, at many levels, in the courts, in Congress, at state and local levels.

II. The area of integration in the sense of social acceptance: namely, the development of assumptions of belonging, of equality on informal levels of actual relational contexts. Mr. Parsons emphasized the crucial importance of this area, and its susceptibility to study by social scientists.

III. The interest level: namely, the area where vested interests, both economic and political, are determinants of the achievement, the rate of accomplishment, etc. of Negro aspirations.

Mr. Parsons then proceeded, after citing the history of the successive inclusion of other disadvantaged groups (Irish, Jews, etc.) to suggest three broad types of process involved in the integration of such groups in the society.

I. Upgrading of the resource base, including

a) Economic improvements--and where the Negro is encountering serious setbacks;

b) Improvement of political power positions at different levels;

c) Improvement of educational opportunities and attainments.

II. The pluralization of the structural position of members of the group, the differentiation of roles and of those with whom they will interact, not simply being categorized as Negroes.

III. Symbolic levels, which closely affect social acceptance (cf. above), whereby the excluded is always symbolized negatively as the inferior.

IV. The relation of the racial problem and the general problem of poverty and lower-class status in American society: this perhaps the most important problem of all.

Throughout the conference, this "map" of Mr. Parsons' was frequently reverted to, and to a large extent served to provide foci of problems considered.

Three basic factors necessarily constituted the preamble to discussion: (1) the explosion of Negro militancy; (2) the passage of Civil Rights legislation in 1964; (3) the impact, anticipated, of the poverty program on the economic problems of the Negro.

On the assumption that the Negro community, now more united than ever and confronted with hardening white resistance, will be dissatisfied with the rate of change in his relative position, the following topics were considered of signal importance. (An examination of the transcript can well suggest additional topics for treatment to those listed here.)

A study, in Mr. Moynihan's phrase, of the strategy of reconciliation, of means for gaining a larger inclusiveness at Mr. Parsons' "symbolic levels."

A study of indirect victimization, not simply the exercise of prejudice or discrimination, but the institutional processes, the changing social and economic structures which militate against equal treatment. Examples: medical care, trades unions, legal services, education, distributive system.

A study of the protest movement itself, its leadership, techniques, conflicting aims (? integration, equality of opportunity, etc.?), effect on participants, etc. Analogies with labor movement.

Necessarily related to the above, a study of the problem of Negro identity, identity confusion, negative and positive identity patterns, relation to African descent, and, immediately connected, a study of the individual vs. the group, both with reference to identity and with reference to rights, leading to the problem of the rights of the individual vs. the rights of the group, with all philosophical and legal implications.

Again related to identity, the differentiation of roles of both the Negroes and of those with whom they will come in contact, the reactions to Negroes at different levels of persons of different ethnic groups, different cultures, or different economic levels.

At this point, it is of interest to study the new involvement of the white churches and of white students in the Negro protest movement.

Study of relations at social levels must confront problem of intermarriage and miscegenation, of the probable genetic pool of the Negro. Mr. Hughes: Some one should do a piece of social science fiction showing what a completely integrated society would be.

A study of the function of political bargaining.

A study of the law in operation on the lower levels of participation--court hourse, police, minor administrative office.

One can debate whether the low economic status of the Negro is because he is black or because he is poor, which means he is underemployed and uneducated. With the two greatest needs of the Negro acknowledged to be education and employment opportunities, the problem of jobs emerges as primary, not because education is of secondary importance, but only that it requires a longer period to pay off.

As to jobs, the need was expressed not only for action to increase job opportunities (anti-bias legislation, etc.) but for labor force projections to indicate probable range of change in the next decade, identification of objective possibilities for Negro labor force. Mr. Moynihan: This is the biggest problem. The Labor Department wants "questions."

It was suggested by Mr. Fein and Mr. Kaysen that a single reference work might be compiled to bring together all the empirical data about the Negro now available only in diverse sources, such a reference to be published separately.

In connection with Negro employment and Negro education, the crucial issue of preferential treatment arose. What are the elements that must go into a public policy on special treatment? Analogies with subsidies, protective tariffs, etc. etc.

Further policy questions raised by Mr. Freund included: The problem of the meaning of the guarantees of equal protection of the laws; what is the proper meaning of color blindness; what of forced integration and individual rights? What of the moral claim to preferential treatment?

And again, in the case of sit-ins to obtain jobs, integrated schools, access to public accomodations, are Negro protestants subject to ordinary rule of law? Is the disobedience a right? What is the validity of moral claims?

As to education, problems raised included the desirability of a Marshall Plan for Negroes, preferential treatment at all levels, the quality of Negro education, North and South, and, for the North, most urgently the problem of de facto segregation.

Urban problems: a series of studies on the impact on the Negro of urban renewal, on the fact that the centers of the largest Northern cities are becoming predominantly Negro (slums), the absorption of Negro migrants, schools, and housing.

And of first importance, a study of the family structure of the Negro, of what happens to urbanizing families, the peculiar nature of Negro family and kinship patterns, the sexual roles resulting from Negro matriarchalism, the psychological effects of father-absence, etc. etc. Mr. Geertz stated that there exists enough material both on the Negro family in America and comparative material to make a substantial statement. In the words of Mr. Moynihan, the problem of the Negro family is practically the property of the U. S. Government, and no other is more urgently in need of attention.

In the final afternoon session of the conference, a consensus was reached that it is desirable for papers to be commissioned and prepared for publication in Daedalus within not more than a year and a half, and that each contributor should know the author and title of all contributions in order to insure the relevance of articles to each other and to present an integrated approach. It was agreed that the issue should include papers of both empirical and philosophical types. And it was strongly recommended that the issue should conclude with some general essay which would articulate the logic of this particular publication.

Several times during the conference, the essential optimism of the American Dilemma of Myrdal was spoken of. That such optimism was not shared during the intervening years by the Negro American may perhaps best be indicated by the fact that Ralph Ellison still knew himself as The Invisible Man in 1952, and as late as 1961 James Baldwin wrote Nobody Knows My Name. It is safe to say that today everybody knows James Baldwin's name, as well as the names of many of his Negro fellows, and the Negro is very visible, North and South. Optimism concerning the inevitable orderly working out of interracial problems has certainly been shaken. None the less, the fact that they are visible leads to a measure of hope that names, descriptions, possible solutions may be discovered if sought for with sufficient urgency and diligence.

Session I

GRAUBARD: First, let me say how very grateful I am to all of you who have been able to come in one of the most difficult seasons of the academic year, and equally so for all the rest who are not beseiged by lectures and theses. Some were expected whom I still hope will come. This was never intended to be an unintegrated group, and you can see both Allison Davis and John Hope Franklin have not been able to be with us, and Whitney Young, who was originally to come, did let me know that an engagement that he could not get out of would prevent his coming. Well, I have not heard of Mr. Davis' not coming. I am told by Oscar Handlin that John Hope Franklin may still be in India. This I didn't learn; he didn't respond to my most recent letter by saying he wasn't coming, so I assumed that he was. But I do think that it is unfortunate that we are not integrated for this occasion. I am quite serious when I say that I wish now that we had asked a much larger number of Negroes, anticipating that some would fall away, but certainly with all of those whom I have been in correspondence, ~~with,~~ there is the assurance that they will continue to maintain their interest in the project.

I would like to say just a very few words about the origin of this effort. I think I am not stating the case too strongly when I say there has been no issue which the Fellows in the Academy have been more concerned for us to do something about than this one. That is, there is no occasion when so many Fellows have come and asked that the Academy undertake a major study of this problem. We had, under Oscar Handlin's direction, a committee of the Academy that met in 1960. Bob Merton is one of those who was a member of that committee. We have since then done various other things looking toward this meeting, not the least of those being the beginning of the preparation of the critical bibliography, which Mrs. Perry Miller is going to help edit for us. But the thing that we feel increasingly is that what we have to do is the sort of multi-disciplinary study that we did in 1960 on Arms Control. That is, we feel increasingly that the Academy is the place where we can call upon the sort of various talents that this problem quite obviously calls for. The Academy gives the possibility, both in terms of the studies that can occur under its auspices and in terms of the publication that can follow, that an enormous difference can be made in respect to this problem.

DAEDALUS, the Journal of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, is now sold in some 30,000 copies. There is always the assurance that any study that comes out of DAEDALUS will also be published by Houghton Mifflin Company. In short, the possibility of a really wide distribution of the results of what the Academy undertakes in this field is assured. This places an enormous obligation, given the assignment of the Fellows, given the gravity of the problem as a domestic problem in this country, a real obligation upon us to do something about it. Now, the thing I hope most particularly that these sessions can produce is some sort of consensus of the sort of study that might, in fact, take place; some sort of consensus about the sorts of problems that ought to dominate such a study. I think we are in a position where if this group can come to agreement about what most needs describing, what most needs analyzing, how much we can and need concern ourselves with the future, I am persuaded that if we can not only describe the situation of today, but perhaps do something with what I would call the ~~pro~~tra jectory of future developments, if we can see the problem in a present perspective but also as it is likely to develop in the next decade, this would be an extraordinary contribution. What I really hope is that you will feel as I do that nothing is, so to speak, decided before this meeting, that we are entirely free to construct this study, to construct any effort that is made in it, in any way that we agree to be important. Now, I have asked Talcott Parsons, who has been one of the Fellows most anxious that we persevere in an effort to get something going on this topic within the Academy, to make a few preliminary remarks simply to suggest the sorts of concerns that he thinks ought to figure in our talk.

PARSONS: I was very glad to accept Steve's suggestion that I try to outline rather roughly a few things that seem to me at any rate to be relevant to the problem of this group, in no case suggesting solutions but only problem areas that seem to need consideration. I am sure I shall not be anywhere nearly complete, but I may help to give you a few pegs to hang things on.

First, I suggest that we might speak of three main levels at which the problem arises. Incidentally, I presume that we have a value consensus; that is, I presume there is nobody in this group who wants to keep the Negro out of full membership in American society, or anything of that sort. So I will speak from the point of view of how to help bring about the general trend toward integration. Now, one level clearly is the normative level. The statement of the moral imperatives and problems of which we have had many, and their embodiment in legal form, at many different levels, by both the courts, the Congress, at state and local levels, and so on. I am not at all one to play down the extreme importance of reaching societal and community consensus in these respects and implementing that consensus by enactment. And I think that while there are respects in which things have gone farther here than at either of the other two levels I want to speak of, an immense amount remains to be done, and I think an immense job of clarification of issues and of ways and means, and so on, needs to be done. Now, jumping to the other end of what is in a very rough sense a continuum, I think we may speak of the interest level, where vested interests in discrimination are deeply dubbed in. I tend to subdivide that into the more economic aspect and into more political aspects, using political in a very broad sense, wherever power factors are clearly involved and their relation to capacity to get goals achieved, whether they be positive goals or negative goals preventing something happening, the economic focusing more on the levels of resources and standards of living and things of that sort. In between, I think, we may speak of the area of integration in the sense of social acceptance. The extent to which, and ways in which, there develop assumptions of belongingness and the whole panoply of equality at relatively informal levels and involving actual relational contexts in a sense in which the moral level does not; the moral is more a statement of principles; this is more a matter of under what circumstances do people actually accept or reject, or in what equivocal ways do they straddle the issue, and what are the conditions of improving acceptance. I myself think that this middle level of social acceptance is particularly crucial and one on which social scientists ought to be able to make an important contribution in understanding the condition. Now, I think it is worth while to note that in the perspective of American history there has been, as Professor Handlin has documented more fully than any other single person, a very notable history of the succession of relatively successful inclusion of groups which have started out in disadvantaged positions in one way or another. Senator Edward Kennedy's speech recorded in this morning's paper cites the record in that respect in a very interesting way. I haven't seen the full transcript of the speech, only a brief newspaper report. But there has been a long series of ethnic groups which have been with relative, by no means complete, success, upgraded. Different kinds of barriers have existed to their full acceptance. I, for example, am greatly impressed by the sense in which you could say that pretty well down through the 19th century, American society was basically a Protestant society and that Catholics and Jews were tolerated rather than being fully included. I think that this has ceased to be the case to the same degree. Not that the problem is over, by any means, but a very major change has taken place, and both the election of Mr. Kennedy and the tragedy of his assassination and the public reaction to it have in a sense put a seal on that integration at the religious level. By inclusion, of course, I mean something which goes way beyond decent treatment; that can be put under the heading of toleration. You don't have to persecute in order to exclude, and this seems to me to be the nub of the problem. Well, taking the normative level for granted, I would like to suggest three broad types of process which have certainly been going on in the society and which of course are subject to manipulative control, in varying degrees by varying kinds of agencies and policies, but I hope this might be a useful broad classification. One category might be called the upgrading of the resource base of the group whose chances you want to see improved, its level of inclusion raised. I think this includes economic improvements, where we know that the previous rate of improvement of the Negro status has undergone a serious slowing down if not complete check in the most recent period. It includes improvement of its political power position at many different levels, where I think the picture is brighter relatively speaking, although with the intensification of the conflict over the issue, there have been important points at which stalemates are reached or even reversals may develop, and here I very much want to stress the importance of the many different levels at which these processes operate. I think education should be included in this general category, because the capacities acquired through educational attainment are perhaps the most important basis in the resources of a group for attaining status in the society, and the cumulative effect of general disadvantagedness in lower educational levels is certainly one of the most serious handicaps at the present time. For example, I think there is an awfully good case for massive federal aid to the Negro in this sector, perhaps as strategic a one as there is. A second broad rubric concerns a type of thing which is not very salient in public consciousness, but I think members of my professional group are apt to be aware of this, mainly the pluralization of structural position of members of a group, a differentiation of their roles and those of the members of the groups with whom they will interact. Both have group levels and both have individual levels. I think one of the most serious barriers, which has characterized many other groups, of course, is the tendency to fuse global categorization. If you categorize him as a Negro, then everything else that is important about him follows from this fact. If his status is differentiated and pluralized in the most obvious cases--occupation, educational level, things of that sort--then he may be classified with others who are non-Negroes in one set of respects which pulls him out of complete identification with the Negro group. This, of course, is a very major theme. I don't think that the analogy between the minority group and the second sex, so called, is very good in very many respects. I think in this particular respect, it is fairly good. There has been a tendency to classify women as women and to inhibit any differentiation on grounds that cut across such status by sex. And the cross cutting of status by race is the theme I suggest.

The third context concerns the symbolic levels, which tie up particularly with what I meant by social acceptance. That is, of course, we have the well-known dualities of orientation here in every case of inclusion, exclusion, symbolization. The excluded is always symbolized negatively as some kind of inferior or source of danger or something of that sort. I think it's very important that really good studies in this area should come out of this enterprise. I myself think that the inferiority theme is a particularly salient one in this case, and that much of the tenacious resistance to abandoning prejudice has to do with the importance of having something to point to that is alleged to be inherently inferior, whether it be in levels of competence, levels of intelligence and that sort of thing, or levels of character, responsibility and other things of that sort. There is another kind of theme. I had the impression when I was talking with Dr. Pettigrew about this the other day that there is less of it than there used to be. But the theme of the Negro as somehow the dangerous uncontrolled element, psychoanalytically speaking, a kind of id symbol, or both, with superior but dangerous sexuality, according to John Dollard's famous analysis, and with aggressiveness that is very difficult to control and keeping him in his place represents his ambivalent position. It's on the one side because he is so inferior that he couldn't make the grade anyway, but on the other side you have to keep him in his place, too, because he is dangerous; he might get out of hand if you didn't keep the controls. Well, the positive side, of course, is a matter of balancing norms, values, interest of factors, and so on.

A very excellent dissertation that has been done in our department on discrimination problems in Massachusetts uses the category of structural discrimination as distinguished from the normative or the symbolic, pointing back to the economic and political interest factors I was speaking of, and I must say I think it's fair to say that intellectuals tend to underestimate the importance of these factors of structural discrimination. The powerful vested interests behind the maintenance of residential discrimination, for example. We tend to think that if it's solved at the normative level, then the rest will take care of itself, which over the very long run, may have something to be said for it, but I need only refer to Keynes on that point. At any rate, one reason why it seems to me this acceptance level is so important is that those who are given acceptance of certain types are put in a much better position to acquire the realistic factors of power than they would be if they weren't given. This to me is one of the most important arguments against the cynical realist who says there is no point in worrying about these symbolic levels; it's a matter of the really hard, rough, infighting at the level of political and economic interests. Well, of course, it is a matter of that, but not only of that.

One final point then. I would like very strongly to stress the importance of our considering the relations between the racial problem and the general problem of poverty and lower-class status in American society. One thing, I think it may very well be that the exacerbation of the racial problem in recent years is in part a function of the upward mobility of other ethnic groups, who have previously had large proportions in the lower class status. More broadly, and this of course combines with the continuing migration of the Southern rural Negro into cities, above all in the North but also Southern cities, there is a much larger proportion of the lowest groups in the visible places, in the urban slum communities, than has ever been the case before. But more generally, it seems to me that the whole problem of lower class status has been masked by our long succession of immigrant groups who were at the bottom of the socio-economic scale, but who have certain expectations of rising, which, in a broad sense, over a long enough time period, have been fulfilled, so that, really, the shanty Irish is not a terribly big category any more and a lower class Jew hardly exists; anything like the lower East Side of New York in the 1890's or early 1900's is unthinkable now. I think that the very fact that the poverty issue is becoming salient again as a public issue, but with very important difference of interests from the previous period, is a very important part of the whole struggle. I would even go so far as to suggest that perhaps a really radical solution of the race problem is not likely to occur until we can virtually eliminate, in this slum disadvantage sense, a lower class from our society, regardless of color.

GRAUBARD: It occurred to me that we might start by addressing ourselves to these remarks and then move from them to certain other considerations. Would it, incidentally, help if we went around the table one by one to identify ourselves?

(Identification of participants.)

LEVI: I think it fits in with the outline that has been given and perhaps is covered by it, and if the question is the inclusion of the Negro in American life, American society, the society has many parts, and in particular I agree with the remarks that were made as to the position of the Negro as part of the poverty group. I would just like to add to that the inquiry as to the acceptance of the Negro in the different facets or groupings of American society, because it isn't all one and it may be interesting to inquire as to the reciprocal element in it, the reactions to the Negro of different levels by people of different ethnic origins, different culture, different economic levels within our own society. I am quite sure as you were suggesting that one of the problems of inclusion is the designation of the Negro as a Negro only. When it happens that he is also a poor man who has various social habits which would be alarming to some societies which do not have poor people in them and do not have those social habits, the attempt then to move toward integration as though it were solely a Negro problem is mistaken. I think it is a much larger question than that because one could find that the problems have existed, as we all know, not just with the Negro, but in the reciprocal reactions of different groups within our society, and it seems to me that this is worth concern.

GRAUBARD: I wonder, Talcott, if you could say just a few words on this matter of the tendency of intellectuals to underestimate structural resistences to integration. Why should this underestimation occur? Is it a fault of the continuousness of a certain theory about integration which still dominates despite the experiences of the last ten years, or what is suggested by your comment?

PARSONS: Well, I am sure that various people here are much more knowledgeable than I am and I hope they will chime in on more detailed matters. I think, however, there is a tendency for intellectuals to think rather ideologically and to emphasize the bigger picture, and the relatively visible things in the bigger picture are apt to be a Supreme Court decision or the passing of the Civil Rights Act or something like that. Intellectuals are apt not to be terribly interested in or terribly knowledgeable about local community affairs. They are apt to have something of a condescending attitude toward both small business men and politicians, who are the most important people in the actual processes that go on. It would be things along those lines.

HUGHES: I would like to talk to that point because I think it is perhaps the most important thing that Talcott said. We have talked about race in this country very much on the individual psychological level as though a few individual decisions here and there can correct this all. As a matter of fact, the Negroes themselves in their movements are generally operating somewhat on this level and somewhat on the idea that the American social structure is what it was 50 years ago, and it isn't, you see. No doctor goes out and hangs up a shingle to start a medical practice now, be he white or be he Negro. In order to be a successful physician now you have to get yourself involved in a very complicated structure. You have to go to medical school, fill a residency, be taken on by some professor in Mass. General Hospital or something like that, and you have to find your way through a perfect maze, an organizational structural maze, much of which is quite new and changing, and you could change an awful lot of individual attitudes and still not get anybody into that structure at all. This is happening in so many aspects of our life; it is not only the old structure and the vested interests, but changing structures, so that the course of a man's career and most occupations are quite different from what they used to be, and the difference is mainly structural.

I would only disagree with Talcott in this point, that I don't think this is peculiar to intellectuals. I think the Negro leaders themselves are mostly operating with a very much over-simplified and antiquated notion of social structure, almost as simple as the AMA likes to put over on us, and I would think that one thing we might do here is really take a look at the changing American economic and social structure and to see the Negro in it, not in terms of the past but in terms of where he is now and where he can go from here. I'll give just one example of non-structural thinking. Those trade unions in New York are not anti-Negro; they are just pro-Irish. They take only their relatives; that's a structural fact and they don't want any alien anymore than they want a Negro. They just don't want any alien at all, and our whole history of industry is that little groups control the hiring and they hire their friends and their relatives. If a man is appointing a resident in medicine, he asks his friend in his same speciality, whom he trusts, who is the best resident going this year, and there is a whole complicated set of decisions that are essentially structured. This is part of what I think you meant and just to say you remove prejudice and then it all clears up is much too simple, and I don't think anybody has done a good job of drawing this all together--this point of view.

LEVI: This is right along the line that I was trying to say. Of course, I was thinking, and you spoke of it, of the Hyde Park College Community, which I know very well. There it sits with a population in Woodlawn which was never integrated into the university community when it was white, and now, it is Negro, it frequently appears to intellectuals that the problem is to affirm that one will have integration with Negroes. Actually, it is an integrated community; the Hyde Park College Community is 40% Negro and well integrated, but it has been a constant struggle to convince some intellectuals that this can be done at a social and economic level which would make for a compatible community, and it is at war with the intellectual's notion that if you are doing this sort of thing it must always be a disguised way of keeping Negroes out. So it is a confusion which the intellectuals perpetuate.

PARSONS: Well, the Harvard Faculty Club does not have at lunch every day a random sample of the population of Cambridge, and this isn't because of discrimination in the cruder sense, but because it is a subcommunity that has certain common interests of its own and has no reason for bringing certain others in.

MERTON: But it does have a cross section, perhaps not a representative cross section, of ethnic groups, and it's of ethnics because that overlaps your composition of the faculty, and I think that goes back to one of your earlier structural points. Since I gather what you want, Steve, are free associations--that's what you said--I'd like to add one or two.

The major emphasis in Talcott's outline at the third level, as he describes it, the problem, mainly, the social relations, the effect of social relations between Negroes and others in the local and national community, would besiege this inquiry as it is carried forward. the question of trying to meet head on one of the most sensitive questions in this whole problem and put it, semi-paradoxically, that the White Citizens' Council, Senator Talmadge, and others of that ilk, are basically correct in saying that as you get integration in a variety of statuses, you will inevitably get intermarriage and miscegenation, legitimate miscegenation, and that, although it may not be politic, whether in this inquiry on an analytical and social policy level, we would be prepared to examine the hypothesis. That is to say, one of the greatest barriers to any of these other efforts is the recognition by large numbers of Negroes based on experience that this so-called integration, even on a normative level as a matter of principle, goes just so far, but no further. You have this represented, I think, in the writings of upwardly mobile Negroes who have been mobile educationally, mobile socially, and who meet head on the fact that when they come to Harvard or Columbia and when the dances are held, there the line tends to be drawn. The essential point, if you are going to get the kind of complete cross-cutting status sets, is that the ethnic or racial origin of an individual gives you no necessary clue to any of his other statuses, because they may be interdigitated, randomly distributed. The critical test, both symbolically and practically, is, I would say, whether our analysis, even our forecast of final integration, would resort to adroit, discreet, or politically intelligent devices for avoiding this issue, considering it a kind of subject that could only lend ammunition to the White Citizens' Council. The fact remains that the analysis on the social level, I think, must necessarily become hypocritical if it is not met head on. . .

HANDLIN: What is the issue? Or what is the question you would like to ask?

MERTON: Well, the specific question which I ask is whether this inquiry would include treatment of the problem, or the question, whether the kinds of processes that are going on to eliminate discrimination have as a direct ingredient of the outcome the intermarriage of Negroes and whites, rather than a skirting of this issue or a denial by ommission.

HUGHES: I was going to testify that if you could find somebody to write a nice, imaginative, we call it social-science fiction, piece on a family reunion in which the large kinships which come together would be all colors and maybe there would be a young woman there coming home to tell her parents that she was engaged and they would say, "What's he like?" and she would reply, "Well, I'd say, he's sort of dark brown, some such color, who wears yellow neckties," and so on; I thought, and I still think, that somebody could do a social-science fiction story on what a completely integrated society would be and how it would lead inevitably into the family. You can't do it without that. Then I think that when this really happens, there will be two groups left. There will be one completely white group left and they will be the Jews, and those Black Muslims who take their Muslim religion seriously, so you will have Black Muslims here, and white Jews there, and all the rest of us integrated.

BELL: Since we are opening up the spectrum, let me try another one. . (interruption)

PARSONS: May I just throw in, before we leave Bob's point, that I think he's entirely right. Incidentally, I understand from some lawyer friends that it is very probable that the issue of the constitutionality of anti-intermarriage laws will be coming up soon and they will be declared unconstitutional. But some of you may know the very interesting study of Dr. James Bashiers of MIT, in which he propounds the thesis, very convincingly to me, that the primary basis of residential segregation, not in the vast racial sense, but by social class, is for the higher groups to minimize the probability of intermarriage with the lower.

HANDLIN: Which higher groups?

PARSONS: Whatever they may be by the usual standards and, therefore, the sense in which letting down barriers for a particular group to reside in a particular neighborhood or a suburban locality is an index of ceasing to worry as much as previously that one's daughters would marry someone outside that class.

BELL: The spectrum I would like to open up is somewhat different from the talk so far, and perhaps in the earlier part of these sessions it is agreeable to lay out a variety of approaches. I think what is most striking about the problem now is that, at least in the last year or two, the initiative is being taken, a very logical path, by the Negroes, and this seems to me quite rare, quite unique. This adds a very different dimension in terms of what things the Negroes are now demanding, things which are very different from what might have been true several years ago. Now, in view of the fact that the initiative has passed to the Negro community, two things strike me as being relevant. One is perhaps an analogy--like all analogies, partly imperfect. The situation nearest to this I can think of is that of the CIO in the 1930's, in which you had a kind of grass-roots upswelling; you had an upsurge from the ranks; you had people thrown up from the factory; you had native leaders naturally just coming to the fore; leaders who were unknown to the rest of the community. One significant example in many southern communities today is the old community leadership saying, we don't know who the new leaders are. We can't even deal with the old ones; how can we deal with the new ones? It is very like what happened when the CIO Unions formed and the management said, oh, these new leaders, how do we deal with them? Now, the CIO was able to institutionalize its protest because it had a particular locus, which is the market place of economic bargaining. You could organize a contract and get certain kinds of demands, and if one thinks of where the institutionalization of this Negro protest will come (because in some respects, unless one posits, as Malcolm X would, a complete revolution, it would have to institutionalize somewhere) I think that there is a certain analogy, and that the institutionalization would have to be in a political process, that there would have to be more organized political bargaining. Now as I say, this is perhaps too much of an analogy to the CIO situation, where you had institutionalization on economic bargaining, and where it was much easier, in effect, because you had a more defined structure to contain it. You had history, in effect, of efforts of this sort. But there is in one sense a history in the record of ethnic group protest in the past, against a situation in which the institutionalization it seems would take place in a political process. And here one would try to identify how exactly the Negro community can now organize itself, but in a political way. It seems to me this becomes a rather important area in terms of what is happening within the Negro community.

The second point which comes to me very sharply, particularly from reading the book that Nathan Glasier and Pat Moynihan did on New York, where you have one million Negroes and perhaps the largest community of its kind, is a very striking difference from other ethnic group patterns, which might be called in a rather crude shorthand the lack of an infrastructure within the Negro community. Anyone who has even a very mild acquaintance with the Jewish organizational life is aware of the extraordinary proliferation of Jewish community organizations, self-help organizations, employment organizations, hospitals and various others, which give a certain thickness to the community. Franklin Frazier wrote many years ago a bitter book attacking the Negro middle class because, in effect, it was fleeing from the Negro community. Now, to some extent, one sees some of the consequences of the fact that the Negro middle class has fled from the Negro community. You don't have the kinds of internal, infrastructure organization, so to speak, so necessary for the community to help itself. I don't think this job can be done from the outside. I think there is too much of an effort perhaps to try to help them, which is understandable, and yet it may not succeed, precisely because it doesn't yet wholly tap the inner resources of the Negro community. One of the crucial problems it seems to me is with the Negro middle class, the extent to which it now comes back to and plays a role in the Negro community. I would say that these would be the two elements that strike me as important, the fact that initiative has passed to the Negro, and this is something quite new; and the analogy in terms of those grass roots with the CIO situation, so that the problem of how you institutionalize the protest becomes a crucial question, and the whole problem of this infrastructure within the Negro community as an area of concern.

MAYER: Two small points which refer to what some of the previous speakers have said. The first one is that if we are going to talk at all about this matter of interracial marriages, it seems to me it should be quite clear to us that we are dealing with a legal rather than a biological phenomenon, because the biological phenomenon has already taken place to a large extent in the United States. As a matter of fact, if you spent some time in West Africa, the very regions from which the American Negroes come, as I have, you would be struck by the fact that when you come back to the U. S. you never see an African who is 100% African. I have a very short story which I think illustrates the point. I spent two months once very much in the hinterlands of Ghana with a Ghanaian driver, going from village to village and hospital to hospital, and one morning my driver stopped the car and said with great amazement, "Look sir, a Negro!" I thought he had gone completely mad, but what he meant was an American Negro, whom he immediately identified; his color was different, and of course, his clothing and everything was different. But I think this is a point which should be kept in mind, which is that the biology and the sociology of intermarriage have already taken place, and what we are talking about now is the legal aspects of the situation.

My second point refers to something Professor Parsons spoke about: the need for people to have a group to whom they feel superior. Now, I happen to have been doing a lot of work on regulation of food intake, and went on from there to study obesity and particularly obese children in adolescence, and I am very much struck by the fact that we are now witnessing the creation to a certain extent of a minority in the U. S., drawn from all various groups and social classes, namely, the obese, who are looked down upon by the rest of the population and who feel the object of discrimination and, in fact, can be shown to be the object of discrimination. They show all sorts of psychological characteristics--passivity, withdrawal, tendency to cling together--which have been described as characteristics of minorities. They are to a certain extent probably not deliberately excluded, but it is rather interesting that while the proportion of obese individuals is of the order of 15% in most of the big high schools from which, say, Harvard University recruits many of their best students, and while their intellectual achievements are of the same order as those of the non-obese, there are practically no obese freshmen at Harvard. The proportion is about 3 out of 1500. So I think we have a chance there to study a man-made minority and to study the very marked intellectual and emotional trauma that I can document. You can predict a very definite fate of the obese as compared to the non-obese, and there is a chance there to study what happens to a new minority in American life.

HUGHES: May I ask Dr. Mayer a question which I think might be thought of. There has been a lot of nonsensical, biological talk about race. Would he or perhaps others, perhaps Mr. Geertz, who doesn't, I believe, claim to be a ~~personal~~ physical anthropologist, perhaps talk to this question at some time. Would it be worth while not to say any word about previous race doctrine but to talk about the probable genetic pool of the people we call Negroes in this country as compared to the rest of the population, or something of that sort. Just use the complete new genetic terminology, an analysis without making any reference to any racial doctrine at all, assuming that the racial doctrine is dead as far as our audience can be concerned.

MAYER: In other words, describe what an American Negro is ?

HUGHES: Yes, and say what we know about his genetics.

MAYER: I think it is--well, I don't know how much we know, but I think it is well worth talking about, especially because it seems to me that one of the great hypocrisies of the South, in speaking about possible and probable intermarriage, is to act as though this pooling of the white and African races has not taken place yet, when, in fact, it has taken place to a degree that we don't really know, I think.

MOYNIHAN: Did it continue to do so or has there been a recession?

HANDLIN: Well, the pooling of the genes did not come about through intermarriage. It came about through miscegenation, and I think there is a very strong case for saying that to the extent the Negro achieves equality and is able to protect himself, the actual rate of intermixture as compared with the period before the war will decline and there will be a lower degree of intermixture than perhaps there was.

PETTIGREW: Particularly because you have passing take white genes back into the group defined as white.

HUGHES: My question wasn't to raise all of that, but just whether there is enough genetics known of the group.

HANDLIN: This question is important because it has not been confronted by anyone seriously, together with the auxilliary questions; whether there are differentials in capacity for performance, intelligence, and so on, have also not been dealt with in any systematic, reasonable way.

PETTIGREW: There are people working in the genetics area and some of you here probably know more about it than I do. Another estimate that they feel rather confident about, I think of Politzer at North Carolina in particular, in terms of blood test determination, from 22 to 28% of those so-called or socially defined as Negro, have gene pool of about 22 to 28% Caucasian, with very little Indian as the Negroes themselves claim. There is apparently little evidence of any great Indian ancestry. This is pretty substantial. This is what makes a difference with West Africa. I have often wondered what the effects would be if that type of fact were pushed popularly in the U. S.

BELL: Actually, it has been used in a very inverse sense; mainly, you get Southern racists who say that the better part of the Negro leadership is white. This becomes used almost as a way of saying that the Negro is indigenously bad, but the reason that they have such good leadership is that they have enough white blood in them. This has been used, as you know.

PETTIGREW: There is a counter-attitude meant, too, that since they are mixtures, they are worse, since they are not hybrids and so inferior. So they use either, just depending on their needs.

GEERTZ: Well, I would like to cite this genetic thing about which I will just say as preliminary that I think very, very little is known about this problem, and even such things as blood groups are so unstable it is hard to get material, but that's neither here nor there. There are two things I want to comment on, and again this is throwing out lines. One is in respect to Talcott's talk. One was something in which I was very surprised that he said nothing about and one which I would like to question. The one he left out which has been now raised by Professor Handlin is the peculiar nature of Negro family patterns in the U. S. As long as we can remember, the distruction of kinship patterns when they were brought here, the peculiar kinds of patterns which took place under slavery and the plantation system, and the particular kinds of, sort of so-called matrifocal families, and so on that now exist, have been obviously critical. The relationship--I have students working for me now on this problem--the particular nature of the sexual Negro society, the male and female role, and what a Negro woman thinks a good man is like and what a bad one is like, and which she tends to prefer, and what a Negro man thinks a good woman is like, and so on, and the kinds of socialization of these roles is, it seems to me, absolutely critical in any understanding of what is going on in the Negro problem and also relevant to the sort of thing Dan Bell was mentioning of the lack of infrastructure and internal organization.

The second thing that I would just like to question is Professor Parsons' passing comments on the relationship between class and race. I am not ready to be convinced yet that the racial problem rests on solution of the class problem. I think, as a matter of fact, one might argue quite the opposite, that until people in society learn to live in interclass neighborhoods and get away from the suburban mentality and away from urban renewal patterns which tend to use class mechanism to produce certain kinds of single class, but multi-racial society, we may not get very far, but just into certain blind alleys of certain levels of integration which we can't then get out of. I don't insist on this; I just say that the whole question of class and race and the priority of them, the relationship between them, which of them is really fundamental and how they go along together, needs much more thought than has been given to it so far--how far is the Negro problem a class problem, how far is it a racial problem?

PARSONS: I think I would concur. I wanted to stress the very close interdependence rather than any specific thesis with reference to priority. But when you say you doubt if one can be radically solved without the other, you are asserting interdependence.

GRAUBARD: I was very much struck by what Mr. Hughes said earlier about the absence in the professions of any way for the Negro to enter this community, the absence of easy access, and really this whole question of trying to describe the society. I think, it may have been your idea, Dan; you once mentioned that in a sense the Negro is trying to get into the labor union at a moment when getting in and particularly getting into the skilled professions is not the thing, or maybe Mr. Hughes said it, that maybe it is not the thing he should be trying to do anyway. And I wonder whether we could now emphasize this matter of the nature of the structure, economic and social structures in our society, that in fact make the problem all the more serious, because this is what I think, certainly both Mr. Hughes and Mr. Bell implied.

HUGHES: We certainly have a labor force and labor structure in which the demand for agricultural labor is gone under zero, practically, and the Negro labor as well as others, the Negroes have concentrated there. The last paper that Franklin Frazier wrote was the one which I have given you on the place and condition of the Negroes in the city. The unskilled labor force is disappearing; it has disappeared in steel, disappeared in stockyards, and in many places where the Negroes were before and where these other immigrant groups started. And, incidentally, most of these immigrant groups that we are speaking about started at the bottom--illiterate and at the bottom--except for certain skilled ones. The skilled group is going, and what we seem to be getting is a fairly literate group that can move around and can work on one automated machine about as well as another, and the Negroes happen to be coming to the city just at the time when there is no more demand for illiterate labor; they are the first group that has come to the cities in great numbers at a time like this. It seems to me that this has to be spelled out with some good labor force man who can project it into the future, saying what is the labor force of the future going to be, and say, given the position of the Negro and the labor force moving and him moving, too, what are some of the theoretical possibilities, the statistical possibilities here, and I think if we don't do that then we won't be doing a good job.

MOYNIHAN: I would suggest that projecting the future of the labor force movement is really, in effect, already done, and it has been made clear that there are no possibilities. It seems to me that this is something that the Negro still hasn't got clear; they are still trying to get in where there is just not enough to get in, that's all--where nobody is going to get in. There are some Italian unions, too. You have seen where the Italian union leader specified that there were five minority members of his union, of whom two he admitted were dead. Therefore, it seems that the strategy of integration, the strategy of the Negro has got to be to create an employment situation which cannot now be projected from the implicit forces in the company. It's going to have to change those projections, and I think the way in which they can be changed are matters much beyond the present dimension of the Civil Rights movement and much out of the minds of almost anybody.

KAYSEN: When you make this observation, Pat, were you saying that if you project labor force demands and supplies on average past rates of growth, foreseeable future rates of growth, best rates of growth we could get, on a policy which you or your boss or your assistant thinks is saleable, the best rates of growth we could get on a sensible policy, the best rates of growth we could get in a very different government situation? What are you talking about? This is a fantastic range and if I had to say what's the range of demand from the top of this fan to the bottom of the fan, let's say from the bottom to the top, for some, say, semi-skilled job, it might be 50% between the lowest of these figures, you know the rate of growth or the demand situation on past labor force rates of growth and the last decade of economic growth versus--and which of these projections do you have in mind?

MOYNIHAN: I'm not sure about this, but I think you could say that the rate of growth is not the point. It's the kind of growth. The rates of growth that you have as alternatives will tell you how big will be shortage of engineers, not how many jobs there will be for the unskilled Negroes, because there are not going to be any more farm jobs, no matter if we double the population.

KAYSEN: Then I think if I read your face right, at least two of us want to enter a professional dissent. There would be a lot of difference among economists who worry about this problem.

HUGHES: There wouldn't be any economist, would there, who would think that those Negroes in New York are going to enter the labor force in the same fashion as the Italians in New York? We agree that there is going to have to be some different way of entering from the old system.

KAYSEN: That certainly is right, but what we are dissenting on, or what I am dissenting on, is the proposition which Mr. Moynihan almost made, and maybe he didn't quite make it, that, you know, if they can't enter the labor force as engineers or as workers above the semi-skilled labor, as clerical workers, above the lowest level, there is no place for them to enter. Now, sure, the way in which the Italians entered the labor force, or the Irish entered the labor force, in New York, is available to no one. Those jobs don't exist. Being a truckdriver, a bull-dozer driver, the substitute jobs, are jobs which exist, and the question of whether there are lots of them or few of them is a question which fluctuates quite a lot with rather small differences in the percentage rate of growth of aggregate output that one projects over a decade or a decade and a half. Perhaps I am looking for the problem in Mr. Moynihan's statement which he didn't mean, but it sounded, at least to my ears, as if this part of the statement wasn't highlighted enough. In other words, as far as just talking like an economist, a percent and a half or two percent difference in the average rate of growth taken over a decade is the difference between maybe an insoluble and maybe a quite manageable problem in this respect, and I would want to emphasize this without suggesting that particular pair of numbers as the right pair of numbers.

HUGHES: But I gather you are interested in making such projections, which I think is the point we had in mind.

FEIN: I think one can play around with the projections. I would suspect that it will not get one very far in terms of the development of any kind of numbers of where the Negroes would, in fact, find employment, in which occupation. I am not sure that the projections would be ones on which one would want to feel very confident, nor should one want to feel very confident about projections a decade hence when small numbers can make big differences.

MERTON: It seems to me that Mr. Kaysen has addressed himself to one of the fundamental general issues that were implied in part of Talcott's presentation, namely, that this inquiry might try to identify objective possibilities, not only in the economic realm, which provide a context for alternatives for the Negro population, but as I understood your point, it was to take a straight economic analysis and indicate the differences, the various rates of growth, that might provide for alternative opportunities for Negro labor. And to me, that seems to be one of the major themes that has emerged so far, that simply addressing ourselves to the Negro problem, qua Negro problem, would be a repetition of what has been done on too many occasions in the past, and it wouldn't give any new perspectives on an old problem.

HUGHES: Well, I think you said what is basic about this whole thing, the thing that would make it different, and there are hundreds of race studies that we have had.

PARSONS: I just wanted to suggest the very close connection between this theme and that of education considered in the broadest sense, not merely schooling, but opportunities for training to acquire eligibility for different categories of jobs. For example, a very interesting history is that of the armed forces in this respect, in training Negroes in new skills which have been useful in the labor force, which I gather isn't going on at nearly as high a rate as it did some years ago because of cutting down on the draft.

MOYNIHAN: Well, the majority of Negroes who are called up for selective service fail to make the test, a clear majority, a seventh-grade test, so they are kept out of that.

HANDLIN: Also there has been no real study of what happens in that experience and what the after-effects are.

MAYER: Wouldn't it be important to try to get, and I know there are such studies, but to try to get a better idea of what the Negro's view of himself, in terms of an economic potential, is, because it seems to me that to a large extent the employment, the directions in which the Negroes are going to move, depend not only on the opportunities offered through varying rates of growth and so on, but also on the view that the Negro has of himself and what he can do and what he should do, and while I have no experience in this field, I am struck enough by the importance of adolescence and the development of what has been called the body-image, or the self-image, to think that this may in turn influence a great deal the initiative and the general behavior of the individual in society. We, I think, don't know enough about this aspect as regards the Negro as compared to other minorities.

MERTON: This puts me in mind of an inquiry I conducted some 20 years ago on an inter-racial community, and one set of findings was that the Negro youth and their parents both had much higher occupational aspirations than the white youth and the parents of the white youth on the same economic level. I wouldn't believe this finding and I have never published it, that's 20 years ago. Since then, there have been a dozen separate inquiries which have turned up the same fact. If, on the other hand, you go on to get their estimates of whether their aspirations will be realized, and get them to revert to their expectations as distinct from aspirations, then you get a completely different distribution. Well, now, I am taking up your point, with one suggestion in mind: that if this is included in the general study, I would hope it would be based on evidence and not on, so to say, impression. This turned out to be a very complicated story, and the general thesis that those who are in the lower edges of the economic structure have lower aspirations may not hold as generally as many of us had supposed.

KAYSEN: Just a minor point on this, Mr. Merton, which I am sure you have considered, but some economic studies on the Negroes' consumption bear, at least as one possible interpretation has it, that it isn't the absolute, it's the relative level you ought to look at. So when you say it's the same economic level, do you mean the same absolute economic level, which has been much higher than the relative economic level?

MERTON: The study that you are referring to, I think, is of the relative satisfaction, relative difference in savings proportions of income of Negroes and whites, and so on. No, we had this information both in terms of self-appraisal and in terms of objective status.

KAYSEN: So it was both absolute and relative that you were concerned with. Thank you.

LEVI: I think there is the added problem, again, of what we mean by inclusion in the society, not only from the Negro's standpoint of what his aspirations are, but the aspirations of some undefined groups which wish to have the Negro included--included into what? Because drawing out of what Mr. Kaysen said, one can speak very easily of the kinds of steps that could be taken for the creation of jobs. That is, if the jobs are to keep the streets clean, and the parks clean, and the cities clean, and all of these are jobs which need to be done, one immediately runs into the rebuke, "Is that all you really want to do, to take the Negro population and keep them permanently on this level?" So it is not just a question of the Negro aspiration, but it is a question of--I'm not sure what group it is--the group which would wish to have them included and what its view of it is.

ERIKSON: I wonder if Professor Parsons would add to his point on interests, which I assume means something like vested interests.

PARSONS: Essentially economic interests.

ERIKSON: Well, why couldn't one add emotional or personal vested interests in the maintenance of the Negro, enriching the white and in the way as it exists now on both sides. In other words, I think several remarks have now added to this, including this suggestion about the family pattern, which would make it very important to study how a Negro woman and a Negro man, how their roles as Negroes become interrelated in their training with certain ideas of the family, for example. But also with, if you don't mind my using a term of my own, the "negative identity" on both sides which has to be balanced with the positive ones and the relationship of those two get upset wherever radical change is suggested in both groups and, therefore, there would even be a certain vested interest in this emotional interest in past images of the Negro, even within the Negro group, that resists the number of changes that have been suggested. Now, of course, I do mean that something like this should be done as part of the symposium and particularly important would be what kind of studies do exist.

PETTIGREW: Not many, and particularly not recently. Some of you have mentioned the tremendous amount of research on the Negro, but wouldn't you agree, Everett, that most of this is dated now. The Negro group has been changing obviously more rapidly in the last 20 years than ever before, and our research is late '30's, '40's. It hasn't really kept up with the modern terminology, with the revolution, so that a lot of the very basic kinds of studies simply have not been done in the recent past 10 years. I think Mr. Merton said high aspirations, low expectations, which he found 20 years ago. I would be willing to bet now, if you went back to that same community, you would find higher aspirations and high expectations, too. That is what has happened in recent years--the expectations have gone up.

I would like to follow up, too, on a point that Professor Geertz mentioned, that no one has picked up on the family absence problem, kinship pattern, family life, and this has always been rather loosely passed off in literature with the slavery explanation. Franklin Frazier certainly did give some clues to the roots but the two things that lead me to believe it is particularly critical, I think since you have been talking about economics, education, and most of those the Academy could undertake, but if it wants to take up things at the personal level, the family level has been suggested, I think it is the most critical. For one thing, the degree of father absence is increasing in the Negro group, relatively, not just absolutely, which is hard to keep on blaming on slavery. Obviously migration, urbanization, most of all poverty make it almost impossible for the lower lower-class male to support a family, and we set up aid to dependent children so that if the male is caught with his family the mother doesn't get her check. These contingencies are actually increasing this, and it is getting worse and not better. That leads me to believe that work on father absence, kinship structures (critical for American Negroes) in recent years, particularly by John Whiting and others, has begun to open up the psychological consequence of father absence in rather an exciting way, I think, but they have not applied it to Negroes. But a lot of the things they are coming up with, a tendency has something to do with the ideology of schizophrenia, perhaps, with violent patterns, homicide, as opposed to property crimes. All this is research work not on Negroes at all, but since schizophrenia, crimes against persons as opposed to crimes against property, are particularly serious in the Negro community, it's suggestive that there is something going on here related to family patterns, something that really hasn't been looked at at all.

ERIKSON: May I add something to that. In view of the many difficulties of any pattern in the Negro population, especially in the lower-class, "no"-class Negro population, it may be difficult or not, I would welcome the suggestion--I would suggest this, which I feel, nonetheless, has to be looked at. And, not knowing the literature too well at all, but my impression is so strong that what the Negro family pattern really is has been discussed in negative terms, such as the absence of the father, or the lack of a legitimate, real marriage or illegitimacy. Matrifocal has probably been the most positive term that has been used. Now, the difficulty here is that I think at the moment the young Negroes today, and particularly the ones, of course, who are on the forefront of the further emancipation movement, are turning against their own family patterns, and yet one should investigate very carefully to what extent can they afford to be so radically against the positive elements in the Negro family which have, I think, always been described by sociologists in negative terms because they didn't live up to the prevailing Protestant standards. That would have something to do with the positive self-image and a positive historical image that the Negro has, and some of these young people, you must have noticed, worry about that because if they give this up too fast, what do they have of positive identity elements except the white image which excludes them to a large extent? You see what I mean?

HUGHES: I haven't heard anything much said, except implicitly in what Talcott said, about the movements for change, their objectives, who is in them, who leads them, and I think we might speak of the dialectic between the movement to be integrated and the movement to be separate, and these balance in various ways. I think the French Canadians at the moment want to be awfully separate. Thirty years ago they wanted to be very integrated. The Muslims, those people who now call themselves Black Muslims, think there is no good in a white man so they will be very separate. I think this dialectic of being separate as against inclusion runs through nearly all sorts of movements, but I don't think we really have any good and thorough analysis of this dialectic in American Negro movements; and this, of course, would also include, as somebody already mentioned, who wants the Negroes integrated anyway? Then we have great numbers of people, white people, who join in these movements, and I think they ought to be understood, who they are, why they are doing it. My students at Brandeis are a danger to themselves. They go down south and one got an eye nearly torn out, and he's hardly got it back in order yet. Some of them will physically destroy themselves in this movement. What this participation in a movement means on the part of those who will not directly gain from it--I think this is something to look at. I should think that this is the kind of thing that Pettigrew would be interested in, or Erik Erikson, but I think we want a good look at these movements and to get some good theoretical framework and lots of evidence. I'm beginning to think whether or not we have the evidence for all these things we are talking about.

LEVI: In any symposium I think you ought to have some treatment on what's been done. I don't think too much has been, although a lot has been written on the effect for cultural patterns on the learning process. I won't say more about that because we could all fill it in, but there are many unknowns here, and I'm not talking now about the very obvious effects, but even the effect of the cultural pattern of the Negro of the higher income group, and then the learning process which comes out. I think that there are some mysteries here that would be a good area to study.

SCHMIDT: May I just mention two or three points that may or may not have relevance to what Professor Parsons was talking about in terms of certain aspects of vested interest. One is the question of abortion, which is related to the question of illegitimate births. Therapeutic abortions are six times as common in private services of hospitals as in ward services, and since it is supposed to be predicated upon indications, it looks as if private patients are six times as sick as ward patients. This is involved with law, custom, abortion committees at hospitals, and so on, and the question has been in my mind as to whether the current situation is so satisfactory, you might say, to the private patient, essentially the white group, that there is not much interest in seeing it change.

Then, of course, with regard to criminal abortion, illegal abortion, nobody knows the extent of this, but it is of some importance that in some areas half of maternal deaths are now the results of illegal abortions and most of these come from the poorer, lower classes with many Negroes among them, so that illegal abortion, one could speculate, is a relatively safe procedure among those who can pay enough to get a good abortionist. In a recent publication, a professional criminal abortionist, who was well recognized and well thought of, receiving most of his referrals from other doctors, carefully presented his clinical data and a complete summary of his sources of referral, and so on, comprising some 5,000 abortions over a period of years. His mortality rate was (zero)--he didn't have any deaths in his group and his prices were not exorbitant, if he was telling the truth, but one had to have enough money to go to him. Many of the abortion deaths are not criminal abortions, but are self-induced, with very dangerous methods. Now, here too, this might be a question, if abortion under relatively safe circumstances is relatively freely available, say to white higher income level groups, is there a tendency to a general satisfaction with the present legal framework and legal fictions, and the hesitancy to attack them head on and to face the problem?

The third point may be a little less directly related, but has confused and puzzled me a great deal, and this is the problem of the teaching patient, the patient who is taught on in the hospitals. Harvard Medical School, you may remember, started in Cambridge with three professors, and it was Benjamin Waterhouse who said, "You can't teach medicine in a classroom; you need patients," and he therefore proposed to move over to Boston; and where did he go? He went to the workhouse to teach on the sick poor, and the custom of teaching on the sick poor has continued with some modification. In pediatric services today we see, in fact, in many of them, an integration, that is, the patients, white or Negro, ward or private, are admitted only if they will be subject to this. But, in certain services, particularly obstetrics, this is not the case. And it is particularly in obstetrics that we see among the lower income people and the Negro people a great inadequacy of prenatal care. The question in my mind has always been, is this in part related to the knowledge that the patient is going to be a subject, perhaps an unwilling subject, of demonstration, of repeated examination, and so on. So, would we make headway there in practice and at the same time face a rather interesting problem, it seems to me an interesting problem, of social structure and organization, if we were to examine the question--how can we solve the problem of having adequate patients for teaching our students and do it in such a way that it is suitable procedure for any patient, private patient, your wife, my wife, or the Negro's wife. In medical circles, there is a tendency not to want to talk about this question, in obstetrics and surgery. I wish that some sociologist would examine it.

HUGHES: We examined it, sir, but we didn't publish the results. We made the study in a medical school, in a hospital, a 700-bed hospital, in which every patient entered with the understanding that she was a teaching patient. But we found that the pelvic examination done by the students was always done on Negroes, and the first delivery of the patient or the medical student was either a Negro or a charity case, generally.

SCHMIDT: I think the most interesting thing was that you didn't publish it. I think that is the question with regard to the development of a symposium of the sort that you described.

PARSONS: I've heard it talked about a good deal. I remember one conference on clinical teaching I attended where it was talked about a great deal. The very great changes that have taken place, particularly because many patients were paying their way, nowadays, not necessarily personally, but through various funding arrangements, Blue Cross and Blue Shield and things of that sort, so that they were not charity cases in the older sense.

MERTON: It is interesting that this subject illustrates the two themes that seem to have been running through all of our discussion so far, and I say it's interesting because on the fact of it it is most improbable and I, therefore, find the emerging two themes all the more cogent. I reflected on leaving the room and sitting in a telephone booth with nothing better to do, and the two main themes seem to be, first, the question of what are the sources of explicit discrimination against the Negro. That is to say, the problems that grow directly out of prejudice and its exercise in discriminatory behavior, with the Negroes being treated qua Negro, and there is very little more that can be said on that subject that could be illuminating. At any rate, powerful cases would have to be made for including it in this inquiry, that is, explicit discrimination growing directly out of prejudice toward the Negro. The second theme, namely, the indirect victimization of the Negro, is not simply the exercise of prejudice toward him. Owing to his position in the social structure, he is being victimized by economic trends, economic developments, educational developments as by-product of powerful general trends in the society. Now, this case of abortion as you described it, Dr. Schmidt, seemed to me to be still another instance of the second theme. That is to say, you were not raising the question that the physicians and the students were discriminating against the Negro qua Negro, but that it is his position in the economic structure that results in the increasing tendency to make the Negroes available only when they can't fight back. They are not in an economic position to have much choice, and those of us, and I suppose everyone of us in this room who has waded through literally scores, if not hundreds, of disquisitions on the Negro problem in the U. S. (Mrs. Miller ought to be questioned on the subject) would agree that it would serve as a great purpose, and still another one, bringing the facts up to date, which would simply deal with the outcomes of direct discrimination. At least, I put that as a question just to focus the issue.

FEIN: I think there are a couple of things I want to say. One, I think that there would be some usefulness attached to a profile, economic, social, demographic, of the Negro. I say this at the beginning because we have tended to use, in spite of our own strictures, and for good reason, the word Negro, identification with the poverty group and so on, and

I suspect that unless we make a very conscious effort to remind ourselves, we will forget that 50% of the Negroes aren't in the poverty group, if one wants to define poverty with some absolute dollar income rather than an attitude. We would very likely forget that the average education of Negroes I see between the ages of 25 and 29 is now 11.2 years of schooling. That is, we may very likely forget that there are tremendous differences in the Negro population between young and old, urban and rural, income, occupation, etc. And I suspect that these are differences that are generally forgotten because it is so much easier to talk about the problem as if it was a homogeneous group that we are speaking about. This, it seems to me, is necessary in relation to Dan Bell's talk about Negro middle class, what is it likely to do, etc. I should think that there should be some useful research in this kind of descriptive piece that reminded us of some things that we might forget.

Beyond that, I think that within economics, there has been a bit of a debate on the relative role played in the determination of Negro income, relative role played by discrimination, for instance, lower educational attainment, and I think that it would be well to see what could be done to learn more about Negro education, not as a function of years of school, which tend to be the measure that is used because of census definitions, but rather in terms of content, quality, output. Without that kind of a resolution, you come up with very odd sorts of figures. One can attribute most of the differential in income to discrimination, because years of schooling aren't for some groups, some ages, very different. If you start assuming that there are differences in the quality of schooling, then discrimination becomes less important and education becomes more important. In terms of the policies and the kinds of things that Talcott Parsons was addressing himself to in his earlier remarks about the importance of education, I should think that it would be very useful to know more than we do today about the quality of schooling, lest we take these numbers at their face value.

HANDLIN: I was really speaking to Bob Merton's point of view.

KAYSEN: I would just like to ask Mr. Fein to say one more thing, which is, how, if he were, so to speak, commissioned to put down such a profile today, how much of the relevant information is at hand? How much really would you have to dig for things that we don't now properly know?

FEIN: I don't know, Carl. I should think that the 1960 census tells us quite a bit. Dan Price is doing one of the Social Science Research Council monographs, out of the 1960 census, on the Negro. I saw Dan yesterday. It was my impression that he is very much concerned about mobility. . . cohort basis. It was also my impression that there are still data that aren't being looked at as carefully as they might be, on income and so on. So I think that, while I am sure that, when one got into it, one would wish there were more data available, I am equally sure that the data available hasn't been explored sufficiently.

KAYSEN: So that, leaving aside the question of mining your census, which may be and usually is a ten-year enterprise, one could make, from your point of view, out of the materials at hand and appropriate levels of detail, a pretty good assembly, now, on the points that you would pick out as being equal.

FEIN: That would be my suspicion. I may be wrong.

HUGHES: The quality of schooling?

FEIN: No, not the quality of schooling, no, that is clearly no. It's negative things on the quality of schooling. The quality of schooling isn't in the census; the years are, and that's just the trouble.

KAYSEN: The quality of schooling might be in the draft debate statistics.

HANDLIN: Apart from the report of the President's Manpower Commission in January, there hasn't been any effort to use the draft material. I was really signaling your attention to the comment by Bob Merton. First of all, anyone agrees that there is a preponderant attention to the sources of explicit discrimination, but I am not sure that we have enough on that, and especially enough in the light of the situation since 1945 and especially enough on theareas where it is likely to be most important in the deep South. Almost everything we have, a good part of it, was written before 1945, and the rest of it is written as if Mississippi, Alabama and Georgia are what they were before the war, and so on. Yet these are very rapidly changing societies, and the consequences--their changes and the changing social structure in these states--on the Negro may be very important, and they really haven't been treated.

On the second point, I would sort of agree with what you mean, although I don't like the description of what is happening in indirect victimization, because it makes the Negro purely a passive quantity, or seems to, as if whatever happens is unilaterally the effect of what non-Negroes are doing for Negroes. I know you don't intend that, but I think to put it in these terms would be to miss part of the dynamics of the process. For instance, this whole process of medical care about which Dr. Schmidt talked is certainly connected with the absence of any autonomous medical institutions in which Negroes themselves have a controlling voice. Certainly the situation of other groups is different in that as soon as there was a core of doctors, then they set up hospitals of their own kind. Now, there are reasons why the Negroes don't want Negro hospitals, even when, as in New York recently, they were offered one. Partly it is a sense that this runs counter to their whole objective of integration. Partly, it falls through the absence of that kind of communal structure about which Dan Bell and Pat Moynihan spoke earlier. To regard this problem, which is a problem, as simply one created by the non-Negroes for the Negroes is to miss the fact that there are involved two sets of reactions in it, both of which have to be considered.

MERTON: Well, I simply want to speak to the second point first. I hold no brief for trying to summarize the intent of some of the discussion by using the term victimization; I willingly throw that out as red herring terminology. I believe that the essential point of the second theme is precisely what you are addressing yourself to now, that here are identifiable processes in our society and our economy which have differential impacts on different sectors of the population, and we would be trying to identify those prophecies which happen to have a particularly acute or chronic, but large-scale, impact on the Negro population and different strata in the Negro population, so it would be a parallel, I suppose, to the concept of structural unemployment, which is not thought of ipso facto as being related to discrimination, but if it turns out that for historical reasons the Negroes have been differentially distributed within the occupational structure, then they are being "victimized" by these impersonal processes, not by whites deliberately posing these adverse conditions, so I would drop the term, but it seemed to me that was the concept.

Now, on the first point I was trying to crystallize these things and in doing so one tends to overstate, so I don't think I am yet prepared to retreat entirely from my version of the first point. As far as I know you are quite right in saying that a great bulk of published material does refer to a somewhat earlier period, and, the pace of change being what it is, may be in part historically obsolete, although there is more that has been done in the last half dozen years than one might suppose. But even there, as you describe it, the patterns of discrimination begin increasingly to be seen as responses to impersonal and objective conditions. I didn't mean to imply that discrimination was totally disappearing, but it is to be regarded as an intervening process and not the source of the problem, which is the traditional commonsense view of it--if you can only change that kind of discrimination which flows from prejudicial attitudes, the problems would all be dissipated, which is a kind of backhanded utopianism, and it is I think partly what Talcott had in mind by saying that thinking purely on the normative plane of dissipating prejudicial attitudes will in turn affect patterns of discrimination, which will then probably dissolve and change. And it's that theme which I think is largely absent, both from the old materials and the relatively newer ones.

PARSONS: I didn't mean to imply that that side should be neglected. Very notable changes have taken place at that level, really good clear accounts of what they have been and how they have occurred and what the future prospect is are very hard to find. It seems to me that if one of the best lawyers could have an essay on the development of Constitutional thought over a considerable period, it would be a major part of the total picture that Daedalus ought to present.

MERTON: In the matter purely of attitudes, of sampling attitudes toward Negroes, there is a new paper now at press that will appear in the Scientific American-- it's a follow-up of the older paper by Sheetsly & Harriman that's been brought right up to date, so we now have, I think, a time span of 20 years plus in their systematic comparison of the prevalence and distribution of attitudes in this country.

HUGHES: If we're still in the phase of bringing up topics which might be treated, I don't think we've done as much as we might about the resistance and the social consequences of the resistance. And if one had been in Mississippi lately he would notice that a few changes have been made. One of the changes that I'm told of by people around Millsaps College is that the professors are moving closer to the campus, and even a white college campus is becoming like a compound--they don't feel very safe, they feel that their children will be sat upon as nigger-lovers, that they will be unwelcome in the community, and a very close tightening-in has occurred. I was in Tougaloo College--the only college in Mississippi where they dared try to have an integrated meeting, the first integrated meeting of sociologists in the state. There are 11 members of the American Sociological Association in that state, four of them at Mississippi State University, which is the only one that has any research money from the Department of Agriculture. Those four men did not come. They had been told that it was not in their interest to come to an integrated meeting. There are some very interesting socio-psychological questions. If you go there people will tell you that there are more and more people in Mississippi who don't agree with the integration policy, but there are fewer and fewer who dare express those attitudes, and I think this phenomenon of the effects of a bitter resistance is an integral part of this story.

HANDLIN: You've got Alabama, Mississippi, Georgia and South Carolina. As of 1940 one would have said these states could be handled pretty much in the same way, and they have been. Georgia and South Carolina now are altogether different from Alabama and Mississippi. I haven't the vaguest idea of why.

MAYER: My point goes back to something Mr. Fein said some time ago and also a point which Mr. Merton made of the dating of our information. In preparation for this meeting I thought it would be interesting to see if I could find anything on nutrition of Negroes as compared to other groups, and I was struck by the fact that there was a great deal of work done in the '30's at a time when pellagra was still one of the great killers in the South. And that there has been no study really on the nutrition of the Negroes since. Not only that, but writing to the various health authorities in New York City I thought would give some information; it turned out that there have been a number of studies on food habits of Puerto Ricans, food habits of Eastern European Jews, food habits of Italians, all sorts of little hymn books that are given to people in welfare and so on, so that they will know what the food habits of these people are and what their problems are, their attitude about food, but there is nothing about Negroes. If you talk to the people who are in these departments, it is quite obvious first that their attitude is that they don't want to study it because that would be discrimination, and that this has become a subject which is taboo, comparing Negroes and whites as such, and is in itself an obstacle to progress. The second thing that you do find, both in New York and to a certain extent in Boston, which is important from our viewpoint, is that there are certainly basic differences between the New York born Negro or Boston born Negro on the one hand, and the very large immigrant element which is a Southern element, and this makes for differences in food habits. It makes for particular difficulties, as a matter of fact, on the part of the southern immigrants because they are trying to reproduce a southern diet, which is a poor diet, but more costly to reproduce in the north. Just as, for that matter, Puerto Ricans spend a lot of money buying bananas and guava jelly, which is of no great nutritional value. But these things, neither dietitians, no one has found out; there is a complete sort of black-out of information on the Negroes as a consuming unit in terms of nutrition since around 1945.

MERTON: Steve, doesn't this raise a general policy question regarding the proposed study? Is the thought that this study, if it is begun, would be based on existing material as distinct from digging up new material systematically? If it's the latter, then I suppose that we are talking about a time span of 3 to 5 years at a minimum. If it's the first, we may have very little option, that is to say, if your exploration found there is simply nothing available in undigested form, I think that would be an appropriate way to describe it. But then, there is nothing much that can be said about it, except to raise the issues and to point to the need for initiating new inquiries. I should think this should be one of the general questions, too.

GRAUBARD: What I thought we would do this afternoon is lay out some of the problems and then perhaps in the session tomorrow morning. In this connection I would just point out that before you came in, Oscar, I once mentioned the earlier committee that sat here under your chairmanship, and one of the paragraphs in Mr. Handlin's report was that participants were impressed with the fact that Myrdal's American Dilemma was published just as the change in racial relations started. This impressive work of synthesis was undoubtedly influential, and it has offered a neat opportunity to study not only social change but also the role of social science in affecting social change. A frank view of this subject that focused on what has happened since Myrdal's book would measure the important changes of the past 20 years, would point to the directions of probable future development, and might say something useful about the validity of predictions in the social sciences. Now, this might be really one sort of thing, I think, much of this would be in your category of a 3 to 5 years study. I think in much of the earlier talk this afternoon, we have really been discussing other sorts of topics on which probably the research is already, if not done, at least in an advanced state sufficient to really permit a whole new set of questions being put and a set of hypotheses being offered, and I think they are two different things.

Frankly, one of the things I had hoped for in our sessions was that we would try to come to some agreement amongst ourselves as to what order of priority we might give to these quite separate enterprises. I do think they are very separate, and there has never been an intention in the Academy to launch a program of the ambitious nature that Myrdal, after all, spent four years on and directing a hugh staff, but there is the possibility of research which might need publication in Daedalus, which has sometimes taken three years, and there is no reason why, if that is the most useful thing that we could do, why we couldn't direct it to that. But I am struck with the fact that these two possibilities are quite different.

PETTIGREW: Well, fitting into what you said right there and what Dr. Fein mentioned, too, the need for demographic, economic, educational profiles, going beyond the census, and what you said there, perhaps comparing it with the Myrdal, and the late '30's. If either or both of those things are done, much the same thing, I would like to see it tied in with what Dr. Merton mentioned earlier. It seems to me to be most useful, in terms of practical aid for the situation in which the country finds itself, projecting this future in terms of different alternatives that would be open to Negroes depending upon what happens, depending upon the growth rate, and what it is likely to be economically in the future, as it unfolds, as we get further in, different alternatives, strategies, actually worked out. One thing is that I couldn't agree with Professor Hughes more--Negro leadership, at least leadership that is still in control, how long it will remain, I don't know, but the Martin Luther King, NAACP type leadership is hopeless behind, much like Booker T. Washington, really arguing for a kind of training which was already going out in 1900. I think they are pitching their projections of getting the Negroes into American society behind the times, and if we could furnish a role here, not just for them, but for the country, of the speed with which things are, in fact, changing in the general society and how Negroes may fit into it, depending upon different outcomes in the next ten years, so that any kind of demographic, economic profile of where he stands right this minute as compared to Myrdal based on along about 1940, I think it would be only maximumly useful if it were tied into this alternative strategy.

Session II

GRAUBARD: It has been very interesting in these two hours to see both what themes have again emerged, perhaps in some instances in a somewhat different form here, but also note some of the things that came from our original effort that have not in any way been represented, and so I have asked Mr. Handlin if he would speak somewhat about our meeting of, I guess it was October, 1961.

HANDLIN: Well, I will be brief because I am not sure that those discussions really ought to influence this group. The group which met at that time hoped to be able to set up in some way, arriving at a treatment which would not be on an intensive scale, but which would be based on literature of the 20 years since Myrdal and would analyze recent social change in the context of the very rapid transformation of American society in those years. We came up with a series of questions, and, in fact, we were able to agree quite readily on a table of contents for this projected treatment, and it still looks like a good table of contents.

The trouble began when we tried to think specifically of who could do what, and what there was in the literature that already provided the data for these inquiries. You might be interested in that table of contents. We began with a section on the question of identity, the changes in the view of who the Negro is and where he belongs in American life, and we subdivided that into subheadings which would take account of the historical background, the technological changes, and the migration into the cities, the international situation and the extent to which that influenced the view of the Negro in the U. S., and the general wrap-up of the factors that influenced the salience of prejudice among other kinds of relationships in establishing the position and the character of the Negro. Then we tried to set up a section that would consider the factors within American society that permit the Negro, indeed permit any minority, to ameliorate his condition. My headings there were conventional, the government, the rule of law, the internal structure of the group with passive mobilization, the nature of this leadership, the strategies of non-violence, which I think was interesting because that was only just beginning at the time we were doing this, and yet it seems quite clear that this would be a consequential element. The third section focused on equality of opportunities as a means of maximizing American resources, and there there would be an attempt to measure mobility, changes in occupational patterns, the role of education, and the extent to which changing views of what is public and what is private might influence the position on a group of this sort. And finally, there was to be a section on the causes and consequences of change. We were particularly interested, for instance, in the role of ideas in influencing social change. It might have been useful to begin with Myrdal and see the extent to which social science had entered into the arguments of purists, the formation of opinion, and so on.

The second subheading there was the causes of change. Some of us had a suspicion that not all the factors involved in major changes which have been going forward, or which were projected or even which are desirable, would be cost-free to the whole society or to segments of society. Some of them might involve sacrifices of other values and might create problems for other groups, and so on, and it would be interesting to try to estimate what those causes were. And then, we were to have a wrap-up of the extent to which all this that we had exposed would tell us something about the nature of the social sciences and the way in which they could enter into a social process. Well, as I said, it looked fine until we began to look at the bodies who would do the work. At that point, we got discouraged, perhaps unnecessarily so, but I think, given the situation of 1961, realistically so; I think it is worth pointing out two significant differences between at least 1961 and 1964, and 1939 when Myrdal undertook his project. First, I think it is fair to say that in the 15 years before Myrdal wrote, there had been a larger and more coherent and more consequential body of monographic work by other people in this field on which he was able to draw. For understandable reasons, nevertheless regrettable ones, I don't think that the years, say, since 1945, have produced a body of literature within this field of comparable magnitude or quality; and secondly, the kind of manpower situation of our own. If you look down the list of people who worked with Myrdal, beginning with people like Ralph Bunche, a very long list of really very competent people, you see an array of talent which was available because this was 1939, the depression; the universities were pretty slow, and there weren't many research projects in operation, and those people whom I knew were not receiving munificent salaries and were not being distracted by a variety of other kinds of opportunities for work, and this is a genuine difference from the situation in which we find ourselves now. Well, in the light of those factors, your predecessor committee grew fainthearted and shoved this in the drawer and left it to you. I don't know whether the same practice will operate now, but I thought you would be interested in this other experience and what it didn't lead to.

BELL: I wonder, Oscar, whether there isn't another element which explains, not only the lack of research, but in effect your most interesting failure, the failure of everybody to anticipate the whole Negro explosion. I think in part, in a way, the whole tone of Myrdal was to say that the victory was won; it was only a matter of time. The whole impetus of the Myrdal book you recall, is to say that this is really a problem in the minds and hearts of white Americans, that people have a desire to be rational, that there is a commitment now for change. These people slowly being pressured away had a long chapter on the attitudes to follow as they began to realize how irrational it is. Of course, this is straight inconsistency and people therefore want to be rational. So that by and large I think the implication was, fitting in with the post-war mood, that it was all a matter of time until the situation is really taken care of. And I suspect that this is a conjunction of Myrdal himself, in terms of what he was saying, plus the mood at the time; so that this leads, you see, to another kind of question. Also, we're going to take care of it again, in that in part the mood of the earlier discussion was probably reflecting the same kind of rational bent, intrinsically, inevitably. What we do about it, what sort of policies can we effect, what sort of new knowledge do we need; by now, however, we may have lost part of the purchase on it, because so much of this is being done outside the perspectives of the two antagonists. There are really two antagonists, the majority of them sort of sitting on the middle helping one, the two being the Negro community as an antagonist, and in a very real way which it wasn't before, and the resistence in a large part of the South. There is a heavy commitment on the part of the Administration for most Americans to help the Negroes, but by and large there isn't even an integration obviously between the Negro movement and the favorable white majority in this respect. And so it's even a divorce and a growing separation between the Negro movement and the majority of white Americans sympathetic to them; so that one feels in some respects it is getting out of hand. You feel it's got to come back somewhere. As I say, one senses you can instutionalize a protest movement, but at the moment it seems to me that these are the different dynamics of it. When Pettigrew said earlier, just before the break, that Martin Luther King and the NAACP may be, in a sense, out of things--it's not only may be out of things in not understanding the rare changes in society, but equally in the response to their own rank and file in terms of what is happening within the Negro community itself. I am just afraid that we will repeat some of the implicit optimism which is behind the Myrdal report, and we don't get a sense of what the actual currents are, both inside the Negro community and, as everyone said earlier, the kind of resistance that is being generated, particularly in the white South.

FREUND: I am under the disadvantage of regrettably having arrived late, and so what I am saying might be repetitious, but it occurs to me that perhaps one reason we haven't anticipated, or didn't foresee developments in the so-called movements, is that we were focusing too directly on the part, we were being too scientific minded and not imaginative enough in making comparisons with other movements, not historical enough, too empirically orientated, if I may say so. I know that it is dangerous to do it, but the returns can also be very--almost uniquely enlightening if you get an imaginative analyst. So I would hope that we could focus not only on the so-called Negro problem, but on a comparison with the labor movement of the '30's, for example, when it is asked, after the Civil Rights law, why. It might be relevent to say, after the Wagner Labor Relations, why. I mean, there are obvious differences and, for collective bargaining, one may have to substitute political participation on the Negro side. Nevertheless, it seems to me that one shouldn't lose sight of other movements which can help us understand this movement.

Another point that occurs to me has relation to the legal side of all of this. Someone mentioned the desirability of a summary of constitutional developments. Well, this has some use. I think this is the thing that has been done most fully, relatively most adequately so far. I would hope that there could be some study of the law in operation on the lower grass roots level. That is to say, what goes on in the courtroom, in the police courts, in the magistrate courts, and so on. I think some of the most significant Supreme Court decisions have been the recent ones, having to do with the requirement of common courtesy to Negroes in the courtroom, and segregated seating. In relation to this is also the question of Negro participation in law enforcement, to what extent they are being added to the police force, how they are being used on the police forces, to what extent they are being used as probation officers and the like, and with what results.

Another somewhat broader legal topic has to do with, as it were, the white man's problem and how to reach the white man through sanctions. I know this is a very difficult and subtle question on which the law is begging for help from sociologists, quite apart from the Negro problem. What are desirable and effective and relevant sanctions? Two of the great civilizing instruments of life, I think, are hypocrisy and greed, and the law plays on both by enforcing the overt, non-discrimination; it's hoped that this would become internalized somehow, and that after civil rights will come civility. How realistic is this? I am not loading this, I am asking how realistic is this? Greed is another powerful civilizing factor. To what extent could monetary or economic sanctions--or inducements--be more widely used? Of course, the bill does contain some in connection with bonuses for compliance in certain school systems and that sort of thing. Whether more of that might not be useful, whether sociology could tell us something of a more general nature about these various kinds of sanctions, which are at hand in the arsenal of the law, and among which the law has to choose.

HUGHES: I want to make a strong comment and sort of a substantive one. Michael Banton of the University of Edinborough, who is an anthropologist who does work in West Africa, has also been studying police and equipment around here and one of the things he did here was go to the South, and also Boston, and look at this question of the lower levels of justice, as metered out by police; and he has a monograph that will be out , and he is a possible person to draw into this. He taught at MIT half of last year.

MERTON: Dan, you referred to the possibility that the Negro movement was not foreseen a dozen years ago. I don't know what the evidence on that might be, if that was part of the enterprise, if one looked into the intonations that occurred and were recognized, and the extent to which it was foreseen. But, however that case may be, in retrospect, it might be useful to look into the origins of this movement, not merely in a descriptive way, but, hopefully, in an analytical way. It's at least plausible, and in fact so plausible as to be probably true, that a work such as Myrdal's and all it symbolizes and represents, may have been one of the sources of this Negro movement, far from Myrdal, so to say, having been a passing phase because he possibly misread the dynamics of the situation. What I had in mind are all the obvious sorts of things that we all reflected on. It is a matter of fact that the Myrdal work and others like it were at the very least alluded to in the Supreme Court decision. I happen to be not among those who think that this was a social science decision and that the social science brief was decisive. I think it was convenient. The fact remains that the facts and the kind of thinking recorded in the Myrdal work and others of like kind did possibly in this way change part of the legal situation. As the opportunity structure did improve, you have the possibility that at the very point where a supressed stratum or minority is starting to improve its condition, you get organized revolt or organized revolution. I think that is always true; in any case, investigation of the sources, diverse sources, structural things, the dynamics at least of this movement might be useful, because it, too, could lead to a projection of what might be the next phase.

BELL: I would say, roughly speaking, if you ask the obvious question, why at this time, taking into consideration that this is a four or five-year situation, I think you can fairly quickly bring together a variety of elements which conjoin to bring this. I think the impact of the continual unemployment and the differential consequences of that upon the Negro community, and to some extent even on the Negro family structure, and in some cases like Detroit it seemed to be stabilized. I think one of the curious elements is a fairly obvious one; it is that the Negroes placed high hopes in Kennedy, and that one of the precipitating elements I would say is the curious way that they thought he would go ahead very quickly, and then when Kennedy said that Civil Rights would have to take a back seat to other reforms, you suddenly got this tremendous upsurge out of a feeling that they were being cheated out of a political victory, that they thought they had done some political bargaining, and found that they weren't getting a pay-off on political bargaining. Then Kennedy began to reverse himself slowly and began making more speeches on this, until finally he came up with the Civil Rights bill, so that in those senses it seems to me that one can fairly quickly identify some of the sources which conjoin that way.

HANDLIN: I think it would be interesting to try to localize the sources of the present movement. I think it involves considering the effect of that whole body of literature of which Myrdal is the culminating work, and influential. The interesting thing is that although there is less, I think there was less, original monographic work in the last few decades, the conclusions of that earlier body of work were thoroughly absorbed into teaching on this subject, both in the universities and down in the high schools, so that a young person who was growing up in the '50's would have absorbed these conclusions just as a matter of course, and would be startled by the contradictions between actuality and what he had learned.

MERTON: Just as a footnote to that, Oscar, those of us who were students of sociology many decades ago can well remember the work that came out of the University of Chicago in the 1920's, principally Robert E. Park's work, on the etiquette of racial relations. The chapters of Park's own work and the work of his students deal with the status symbolism of forms of address. Forty years later the emergence of a Supreme Court decision is self-evident of a decision made instantaneously, but when Park was presenting this then strange notion of the etiquette of social relations and its symbolism, it was a bright new perspective, and the extent to which a great deal of the thinking of these academicians presumably imprisoned in ivory towers has been absorbed through the teaching process, the extent is, I think, one of the small degrees of hope. It isn't the old notion of education as a panacea. It is a much more brutal form and much more specific notion that certain ideas become so thoroughly indoctrinated in new generations that after a lag of too many years, perhaps they become the unspoken new assumptions of the age and it isn't the direct illusion. As far as I know, Arthur Goldberg has not referred to Robert Park, but Dr. Goldberg, withal unknowingly, I would submit, was quite directly influenced by Park, probably without ever having read a word of his.

HUGHES: I think this is fascinating, because I was one of the students in that group. You hear people express these ideas--they are common coinage--who haven't the least idea of where they came from. Sometimes I get quite annoyed, and then I think that I shouldn't be annoyed; I should be pleased as hell. It seems to me that when we talk about having predicted something, we would have to say, on what model were we predicting. You could predict on the "O, lord, how long" model, saying that people who are oppressed get sorer and sorer, and you would predict when the explosion was going to occur. On the other hand, you might have been predicting changes in social structure, which takes us back to Talcott's original talk. There has been a fantastic change in the condition of the Negro in this time, and it has interested me in the last few years that the American outburst of the Negro is happening at the same moment as the Canadian outburst of the French Canadian. They have both turned the corner and have become intensely urban. The French Canadians are now the most urban element in Canada, except the Jews; and the Negroes are one of the more urban elements in our populations, a terrific change in their whole occupational structure, as well as, and let's not forget, changes in the world structure, and the French Canadians are saying "Look, we are the oldest minority left in the world." And they are right, the oldest one that wants to be, and the question is when you predict these things, on what model do you predict--world situations, social structure, or simply people on the normative thing that Talcott said we shouldn't rely on too much.

MERTON: My footnote to your remark, Oscar, was a long footnote. There are just two or three sentences I omitted. It was intended to suggest that one of the ideas originally set forth in your 1961 Committee might well be preserved. That is that an effort be made to see, to determine in what ways, and to estimate to what extent, social science ideas of an earlier period entered into the thinking of significant groups in the population. I think perhaps the only new twist is to examine the possibility that the lag is perhaps of the order of 30 or 40 years, and that one might have to go back to work written in the 1920's rather than look at the immediate present, because the rate of flow of ideas into the minds of those who are not in a particular speciality is something we know very little about. This most recent court decision is a symbol, at any rate, that there might be a very long delay, that there could be a delay of the order of 40 years between very clearly exposited ideas and academic inquiry, and their becoming absorbed in the idea structure of people who are themselves not academicians, but who have been exposed to these ideas.

MAYER: Hasn't one of the changes which has taken place, since '61 in particular, but a little older than that, some relevance to the problem; namely, the arrival on the scene in the United Nations of 15 or 20 African-Negro republics, which I think may have far less of an impact on the Negro in the U. S. than one might think, but certainly does have a considerable impact in terms of the urgency with which many of the more educated Americans accept the idea that we have to do something about the problem, for external political reasons rather than for internal or moral reasons? Another point which might be worth considering, if this doesn't extend the range of the inquiry too much, is the problems of some minorities throughout the world which have resemblances to and differences from the American Negroes, such as the one that Professor Hughes mentioned. One which struck me this summer when I was in New Zealand was the fact that while all New Zealanders profess the greatest admiration for their Maories, and are very pleased to tell you that this is a great race of people and one that they are very proud of, and they speak of the military record of the Maori regiment and so on, but when in fact you look into the situation, you find that the Maories are very much in the same type of social environment as the Negroes in this country. They are the poorest urban minority; they have a very small proportion of their number in the professional classes, and this in a country which claims not only that it has no discrimination against the Maories, but that this is a particularly superb group that they are very proud of.

MOYNIHAN: I believe it may be relevant to this question of the transmission of social science ideas into public policy to say that one of the biggest issues, or one of the issues of race relations in this country today is the question of unequal treatment, a positive bias for the Negroes. Some of the Negroes have demanded it; some people have suggested it is in order, it is necessary; some people might even suggest that if ever you are going to have equality, you are going to have to have inequality of treatment right now in the form of favoritism. But the immediate reaction from several quarters is that this is precisely what we are trying to get rid of--unequal treatment--and the New York Times felt compelled to say that this was a terrible idea, each governmental official in turn feels he must say that we musn't have anything like this, that everyone must be treated equally.

And I was thinking that the Academy might do a great service if it were to look into the question, if the Academy, for instance, were to come to a conclusion that if you are ever going to have anything like an equal Negro community, you are for the next 30 years going to have to give them unequal treatment. I think the possibilities of thus legitimitizing such treatment might have some relevance to public policy right now.

HANDLIN: This involves a kind of broad question which is very difficult to think through. If you are ever going to have an equal community it must be put in terms of a question: is it one of the values that we think are important in American life to achieve that kind of random, scattering, individual status, so that every ethnic group would average out at about the same point? That would rest upon the premise which has no plus either way, that abilities are readily overrated, that society has a greater stake in satisfying groups than in maximizing the use of talent. There are a whole range of considerations that have come into this issue which nobody has really explored, and the only map of preferential treatment that has come up is a sort of slogan, and many of the people who use it haven't gone beyond the immediate attractiveness of the slogan, and I should think that this discussion would involve a certain amount of questions about the whole thing.

HUGHES: Certainly there is quite a bit of literature on the philosophy of this. The nationalistic literature in Europe, about the time of the First World War, where there was great emphasis on the same thing as the integration-separation-dialectic. The Catholics in the time of the Kultur Kampf in Germany asked that they have their just proportion of judges, professors, and so on, with all the institutions in the Rhineland. Do you ask for this, or do you ask for open competition? This dialectic is always there, and I agree it would be a good thing to get an idea of the history of this thing; this is wide open and, in fact, in Canada, one moment they say, "O, we want fair treatment," and the next moment they say "Why haven't we got our fair share?" and these are two ideas--a real problem.

PARSONS: Well, I think Mr. Handlin somewhat misunderstands the main thrust here. It seems, I would say as far as basic American values are concerned, that there are two primary aspects of equality which are analytically distinct. One is the equality of basic rights, which, I think, includes the kind of social acceptance that I was trying to formulate, and the other is equality of opportunity. Now, by virtue of the latter, it is extremely unlikely that groups will come out with equal representation in all valued contents. By virtue of the former, however, where it seems to me that we have had a combination of inequality in both respects, we have had discrimination in the sense of exclusion from basic rights. The most fundamental aspect of that is legal, but the legal is not enough, because of the structural and symbolic discrimination that goes along, in addition to those types of discrimination that can be dealt with by the formal, legal procedure. On the opportunity side, which seems to me a very crucial matter, it seems to me that there is a direct analogy to the famous industry argument in the history of economics; namely, groups which have been discriminated against, groups which have been denied equal access to opportunity, may legitimately be subsidized by the community to bring them into line with others. This again is not the same as the quota system, which has been emerging as a demand, but I think tends to lead, if it isn't a temporary measure, to a freezing of the line. It's the same principle as balancing tickets of a political party in New York; you have to have a Jewish candidate on the ticket to get the Jewish vote, and you have to have an Italian candidate to get the Italian vote, that sort of thing, which may be a good temporary expedient, but not a matter of principle, I would think.

LEVI: I am referring again to the discussion about the incorporation of sociological and other ideas in legal decisions forty years later. Any study, I hope, will do the opposite, too, a reciprocal relationship, changes in the law and in the governmental structure which really probably were not done with reference to the Negro. Rights to counsel, for example, changes in criminal procedure, which have a differential impact, to be sure, on Negroes, but they didn't probably arrive for that reason; the extension of federal power, so that State universities receiving grants for research may now be asked to respond to a federal government inquiry as to how many Negroes they hire, and things of that sort. These are unintended consequences perhaps from farreaching legal and governmental steps which have changed the situation. Now for a great deal of this there is material, monographic and other material. The American Bar Association studied, for example, the operations of the criminal law and has a great deal of material. Some of this is of relevance, although it wasn't written for that reason, to differential treatment of the Negroes because of the nature of the crime; concern about sentencing which didn't use to exist in the same way, the statistics, the concern of judges about it. This creates rights. The whole FEPC movement is itself an extension of governmental power, and so on. These things have a reciprocal relationship in creating values, placing them now in a different position and changing power with respect to them. So that I hope that treatment will be incorporated.

HUGHES: The last book that I know of, general book, on the Negro and the law, is what, 30 years old? Mandam?

HANDLIN: There has been a book by Jack Greenberg, Race Relations and American Law.

BELL: Greenberg's was the handbook. I don't think that it stands up very well, Oscar.

GEERTZ: I want to do somewhat the same sort of thing Mr. Levi did for the legal side for the sociological side of this problem--the role of social science thought and development of egalitarianism, or whatever you want to call them, in the U. S. I think that in investigating the subject, again, the other side must be looked at, because there is a very great danger of the fallacy of the positive instance here, remembering Robert Park and other legitimate heroes, but we also must remember that this was also the high point of social Darwinism, or hereditarian thought in American society. We would like to know something about why this disappeared from the intellectual society; it didn't disappear, offhand, I think, because of any kind of concern for the Negro problem. Again, it has to do somewhat with the different role of the intellectual classes in American society, the different composition of them. Why this particular ideology which was at one time very strong, which would have supported the other side of the argument today, disappeared and weakened within the intellectual community long before the racial problem became part of the intellectual's consciousness, and the kinds of basis for this in the changing roles of the intellectual community and scholars, and why it persists? this ideology, this kind of hereditarian thought, in some places where one feels it can't be really. Wisconsin is the most recent example of it. Why do all these people think that Governor Wallace has got something to say to them? Why is this kind of mode of thought up there where there is no "Negro threat" to them in any instance? The whole problem of thinking about why these ideologies flourished in the social sciences or declined independently of this issue might be worth looking into, and then seeing what effect this had upon the direction of thought in the social---

KAYSEN: I'd like to sort of sound a couple of anti-academic notes. I certainly think that it would be a disaster, to put it mildly, if the Academy's energies were focused on the question of estimating the time lag from social science concepts to social action as the important and big topic, but a different one, and it seems to me rather tangential. You know, Keynes said every politician is the slave of some dead scribbler, so he estimated it at 50 years presumably--I don't think it's worth while to correct it to 30 or to drag it back to 60, and I feel that Oscar suggested an idea of equal interest and equal disservice. I agree that the question of equality, what it means, and do we want it, and in what sense is a very important philosophical idea. I would think that given the problems that we are looking at, the status of the Negro is so far from what it should be in any definition of what your goals should be, that I would be highly sceptical that a different path of action would be appropriate, and therefore, since we are not really politicians, a different set of questions to be answered about what the situation is and how it's changing would be important in relation to the change that is going to occur in the next decade. Now, that perhaps is a bold assertion, but I do feel that our energies shouldn't be distracted into things which aren't relevant to, let's say, the probable range of change in the next decade or what can be done to influence it.

MERTON: Carl, you at least agree that that was a provocative statement? I speak to part of it. (KAYSEN: I'll speak to the other.) MERTON: First of all, I think the idea of examining, looking for the historical consequences, emergence of ideas on practical policy, is not tangential. To begin with, it would give us some notion about what the possible outcomes might be of ideas which have been more recently initiated. If you are suggesting that it is a priori clear that the ideas which are now emerging will have no impact whatever on the social process, I think that ought to be examined and debated. I was about to say before you got the floor, and I'm glad you got there first, that the last two suggestions seem to me to be superbly relevant, and had the further merit of being the sort of thing that could be done and done effectively without intensive new research. That is to say, the documentary materials were at hand and there would be a kind of library research rather than field research. First, with regard to Mr. Moynihan's suggestion, simply to clarify what the assumptions are, these claims for preferential treatment, what the possible consequences are, what the rationale of the different proposals may be--these seem to be of the utmost importance to me. This is being suggested on all sides, and it's a work of clarification to look at it intensively and to try to put some order into it, and it's the sort of job that can be done not at the expense of the rest of the enterprise. Any one, two or three persons who agreed to take that on, could go off in a corner without interfering with the rest.

HANDLIN: I think there is a utility to seeing the immediate problem in its long-term context, and I want an illustration by reference to precisely what would be involved in Pat's suggestion, which we seem to agree is a good one even though we don't know why. Now, if we try to see this in its fullest context, we would before long see a whole range of implications that don't appear on the surface. For instance, the contrast between the European experience and the Canadian experience to which Everett Hughes pointed. Until now in the U. S. rights have adhered to individuals but not to groups, and the claims for equality or for rights of other sorts has never been made so far as I know by Negroes or by other groups.

BELL: Excuse me, Oscar, it's not very true of the labor movement. After all, that's group rights, in all kinds of ways. There is a whole body of law in the last 15 or 20 years.

HANDLIN: Well, it deals with the union as a corporate entity; it does not deal with a laborer as a member of a group, certainly not as an inherited status, but I do think it is fair to say that this approach, which may be desirable, would involve a radical change in our way of thinking about rights. And in the second place, I think it is important to consider the implications of a subsidy in creating an interest in being a Negro. This is what happened to some red Indians in the U. S. You know, it came to be an advantage in many ways, and if this were to become a consequential factor, it raises larger implications. If you are trying to look forward to a period in which Negro identity would dissolve, the creation of an interest in maintaining the Negro identity would run counter to that. I'm not saying that that should be the goal, but the implications of such an instrumental step ought to be considered. You know, there really are points on which we are quite ignorant and one of them is how badly off the Negroes really are. It seems to me the concept of "The Negroes." The Negroes--for instance, let me put it this way--colored people are a minority of the underprivileged people in the U. S. But nevertheless if you think of poverty by any definition you want to use, colored people are a minority of the poor. I think it would have to be substantially considered what the effects would be on subsidizing one segment of that large a group. Now, it depends on how you define the groups with whom you are comparing the Negro. I mean, if you take a relative definition of white, non-white in the City of New York, you will come up with a significant difference in the median income. Now, if you take a definition that breaks down whites into constituent elements, that difference is not as sharp as it would be if you deal with it in its social terms. Take a city like St. Louis or Cincinnati and describe the immigrants of the last 20 years. I do not believe that you would find a significant differential in the position of the Negroes and whites in those cities. That is, the poor whites that come in in the same period with the same place have not done substantially better than the Negroes who have come into those cities. Now that's a rough guess. It's interesting that it has to be, but this is one of the kinds of information that we don't really have. Or another comparison that may not be as applicable--the Negroes have been a substantial part of the population of cities like New York, Chicago for about 40 years. In other words, this is a migration that is one generation deep at most, and a large part of it is less than one generation. I would say that people like the Italians who came in in the 1880's by the 1920's, forty years later, had not done significantly better than the Negroes have done at the same rate, at the same impetus. I don't know what the different conclusions of this data are, and I am not convinced in my own mind that preferential treatment is necessarily good or necessarily bad. I think it's got a lot of angles in it and I think that it involves considerations of a sort that are all too easy to overlook, and one of the things we can do is eliminate these features of the problem in a way that can't be done on the legislative floor.

BELL: Oscar, one significant dimension gets omitted from this analysis--I give you one slight bit of evidence. After the '58 recession, when the problem came of who would move out of Detroit when there was great pressure to move out of Detroit because of the high impact of unemployment there, one of the problems was that a lot of the whites who had moved in could move out, and particularly go back south where they could have a little more opportunity; whereas in some studies I remember at the University of Michigan that were done at the time, it was pointed out that a lot of people didn't move back. In large part, this was the first time many of them had been able to get a better education for their children, which they couldn't have got in some other places. That alone becomes, that kind of internal comparison, you see on that gross level misses a very obvious kind of dimension here.

KAYSEN: I suspect that Oscar and I, and I don't think Bob Merton and I, differ on what ought to be studied; perhaps we differ on the language in which it should be described. Take the point that Oscar was just talking about. Do we have as a goal the loss of Negro identity or do we not, and if we do or don't, how do we accept it? Now, my own attitude toward that would be, you know, why ask such a question? On the other hand, Oscar mentioned another thing which I think is a very important question to ask. He pointed out in part of his discussion that it is really a basic principle that we hear, that we try to insure rights in individuals but not in some kind of status groups, in individuals, in functional relations.

Now, I can think of the utility of an examination of this subsidization or preference process in terms of some values that we agree ought to be preserved, and maybe we agree, I for one would, that the notion of rights inherent in individuals is of philosophical value, in law, and politics, it ought to be preserved. But I think you can do that without ever either making up your mind or even addressing the question. What is it that you ultimately want to see happen in relation to the Negro group or any other group of ethnic origin? Perhaps not being an historian and therefore more prone to think that history is made more by random factors than historians think, I rather suspect that trying to answer that question isn't very useful. It requires a degree of foresight that we don't have. On the other hand, focusing on some value constraints I think may be very useful, and examining possible policy alternatives in terms of how they square with these value constraints is a different way of talking about the process. Now, I suspect that it wouldn't be a very different process and I don't know how much it is worth pursuing the different ways of talking about it.

PARSONS: May I say just a word on the point of Negro identity. That is, it seems to me the kind of equalization of basic rights and social acceptance we have been talking about does not imply loss of ethnic identity. It does imply removal of the stigma of that identity, but many ethnic groups are proud of their cultural background and identification, along with a feeling of full acceptance. I think the global character of the stigma is mixed in but I don't think a person who, well a Jew who is a distinguished physician or lawyer feels that though he has a strong stake in his professional position and professional identity, he doesn't need to lose his Jewish identity by virtue of having a professional identity, which is something other than just being a Jew, because there are distinguished physicians and lawyers who aren't Jews. It is a pluralization of reference groups that matters.

LEVI: I just wanted to make one point in connection with these income figures, which worry me a little bit and which I think are relevant to the subsidization point, because you can get preferential treatment of subsidization at different levels. It may be symbolic, which raises some of the issues which we have been talking about. But if you are going to refer to income figures, then you have to refer also to the services which the community provides which are not included in the income figures and which would really alter them quite a bit, and if the school system, as it is, for example in Chicago, has been a system which has discriminated against the Negro, the income figures are not realistic.

MAYER: May I give an example of how far this discrimination can go even in the city of Boston. The Negro schools happen to be the oldest schools; they have no facilities for cafeteria, and therefore the one group in Boston that doesn't receive the federal lunch program is essentially the Negro children who need it most.

SCHMIDT: The trend of maternal mortality is another indicator, that while it has declined over all to 1/10 of the figure in 1940, the ratio of the Negro rate to the white rate has changed from 2 to 1, 4 to 1, between 1940 and 1961. So that the services are not there in quantity or in quality, so again isn't that a counterbalancing factor in terms of what status they have achieved?

HUGHES: Bob, wasn't there a Myrdal volume on the consumption, delivery of services, of the Negro--could it be compared in some respects to that?

PETTIGREW: I would just like to shift the focus. We haven't mentioned this, I think because we are all aware of it, but I think it should be a part of the focus of anything undertaken at this point, which perhaps was not so clear in 1961, and that is the form of resistance in the North on the part of whites, particularly of specific ethnic groups. Being a Southerner and studying mostly race relations in the South, I am impressed with the difference in the form of the resistance and in some ways the greater opportunity and the better organized resistance that the North provides to racial change compared to the South. Not that all resistance comes from the lower middle classes, but that is where its most violent aspects frequently arise, and the lower middle class in the South in the urban areas is typically poorly organized. Klans are actually today the poorest organization you can imagine for generating any trouble one way or the other, except throwing a bomb or two, and that doesn't require a great deal of social organization. The fact is that the lower middle class in the south, whites, have left their kinship structures quite broken; they have left their organizations, such as they had them in the rural areas, they are migrants, too, really. They have little more than the fundamentalist church which they brought with them, usually with the preacher from the rural areas, and they are very poorly organized, actually, for intensive resistance in these cities. In the North, however, where we have ethnic group opposition, they are well organized. They have their ethnic organizations obviously all set up to focus resistance. Their kinship structure is intact, in fact, in many places, e.g. the Poles of Buffalo, it may be better than it ever was in Poland. So that this intensive ability to resist, and resist effectively, and with organization, is in many ways greater in the North than in the South. Of course, it is different because in another way more positive in the North, because it received less official sanction from state governments, and so forth. But this is something I think we have to look at, and perhaps the strength of the Northern resistance to racial change was underestimated.

HANDLIN: Well, it's not that it was underestimated; it's different from what it was before four years ago. In other words, in the state of Massachusetts people who are now resisting demands for racial balance in the schools were the people who threw the FEPC away. Polls in Buffalo voted this kind of legislation in the 1940's and 1950's; now there has been a very radical change in these groups, which is partly a factor of what has been happening to the groups, and partly a factor of the change in demands of the Negro leaders.

HUGHES: In Chicago the neighborhood improvement association and the Catholic parish are two of the biggest forces of resistance, and have been for at least 50 years, and the real estate activities are tied up in this, and when they had to change their tactics, then the new vote decision came against the government.

GRAUBARD: This, of course, raises the whole question of the time factor again. That is, how much can we be concerned with simply describing what is at whatever moment we are working with, and how much must we, in fact, very much in the terms we put out earlier in the evening, try to project forward and try to anticipate what are the likely consequences of further acceleration of certain movements which we have reason to expect will occur and how much such a study must concern itself with the possibility of certain trends now, resulting in important changes which we ought to be concerned to describe.

HUGHES: If we are going to do a compendium, a great encyclopedia of the Negro, you will never get it done. And it might be a good thing to get out a volume that would break new ground on a few points so that, coming out in time, it would be read by the academic community even though the academic community's ideas have respect or not, but it seems to me that the aim of such a volume right now is to be in the hands of people while the action is going on, and is not in a very different phase from what it is now. I should think that some speed would be of the essence.

BELL: I was going to say what seems to be suggested here, though as an entirely different focus, namely, to concentrate on what kinds of things can be done by whom and in what time. Now, if you take Geertz's problem of the structure of the Negro family--this is not something which is going to be changed by legislation or even social institutions operating in the communities for a long, long time. The problems of the changes in nutrition may be subject to a much more direct form of intervention in terms of immediacy. Problems of housing, residential segregation are again at a different level of the problem. And it seems to me that it would be of genuine service, even to the Negro community in a way, to try to specify what kinds of problems are solvable at what level, within what time dimension, and by whom. In part in any situation where you get a protest movement going, you get an expectation that everything can be taken care of at once, and by government, and we've got to have it made or else. And to that extent you get overestimation of the situation and therefore you'll get a reaction. So it seems to me that there is a kind of cutting edge here in terms of what kinds of problems, so to speak, are solvable in what time dimension and in what areas.

LEVI: There was a reference much earlier by you, I think, on the question of institutionalizing the approaches, and undoubtedly this is my bias as a lawyer, but I would assume that one could really start with the proposition that the present methods will not be permitted to continue to any considerable extent, that there is a collision course here with legal norms, and certain of the methods that have been used which have been effective will be curbed, and then the question is what happens next and what the direction is. Now, to project this notion of the legal system and its effect, possible effect, potential effect, isn't, I think, too difficult to imagine; the consequences of the different modes of operation become very much more difficult. It seems to me rather important.

FREUND: I agree with that. It's a dialectical process obviously; but I do think we could lose ourselves in trying to go after rather difficult abstruse data.

KAYSEN: The analogy you suggested earlier seems to me to raise a caution about the use of the labor movement. As I think back correctly to what the collision course then seemed to be on the part of both parties in the sit-down strikes in 1936 and 1937, might not you have said then what you said just now, and would that have been a kind of useful prediction, thinking back, to make that observation of where you were going in the situation.

LEVI: Well, I would have said it is very difficult to know what would have been said then, but there was an article, as you know, by Leon Green in the New Republic or The Nation to the effect that the sit-down strikes are legal. I think at that point many of us could have said that they are not legal. They will not be permitted to persist and other forms of protest and regulation will have to be developed, which is what I am now saying.

KAYSEN: But another way to put the same thing is if no other forms of protest and regulation develop, sit-down strikes will become legal or will be tolerated, and that sounds very different, doesn't it, although it's really the same thing.

BELL: The difficulty in the analogy that I tried to raise earlier is that you have a specific locus which is the plant; you have a collective bargaining procedure institutionalized through law, through the Wagner act; you have direct bargaining. The problem here is the question of who bargains with whom, and this is a much more amorphous situation and it is yet quite unclear even to the Negro community who is going to do the bargaining in this particular way. There is obviously a process of bargaining; you bargain with the school board on busing or not, you bargain on jobs, you bargain in all kinds of ways, but this is a much more amorphous process here.

LEVI: Well, I think the analogy is a difficult one. I don't wish to pursue the labor part of it. I think there are grave consequences from the introduction of the legal process at this point; I don't think I'm talking about a problem which is dragged in as a theoretical, analytical legal operation. I think I am talking about something which one can predict will be upon us, so that it is part of the problem.

FREUND: I want to refer to what I said earlier: after the Wagner Act, what? I was thinking of Taft-Hartley and the Labor Management Act and so on, and one wonders, as Ed is wondering, when reaction will set in. I think there are some parallels. We did not come to the point of citing the relevance of the sit-down strike, because, I take it as was suggested, there were orderly procedures through collective bargaining. That is to say, the law gave recognition and status to these pressures and forces. Now, in race relations, the problem is to find an outlet of that sort. One can sympathize with people who throw themselves on the floor because the bank isn't hiring Negroes, and yet I take it that we would all have to say that it isn't legal. One can sympathize to the extent that there aren't legal processes available for, let's say in that place, like fair employment practice laws, or where Negroes throw themselves in the street, there may not be actually available political participation to free access to the registration or employment on the police force, and that kind of thing. So I think there is an ethical problem here which isn't unrelated to the legal problem, an ethical and a pragmatic problem of finding legal outlets for these pressures if we are going to apply the law against them as the present state of the law would indicate. In other words, we would have to find some reciprocity here. We are really down, in a sense, to a political, philosophical problem of beginning with the social contract and I don't disagree with Ed about the course that the law is likely to take, and it is a problem that is going to be on us, but it makes all the more urgent the identification and exposition both of the ethical and of the practical side of this in terms of the kind of participation in the contract that justifies the law in claiming a monopoly of force.

SCHMIDT: I just wonder if there isn't some lesson to be learned from the unemployed movement, rather than the labor movement, that has many big differences but some analogies. There was no specific locus for the organized unemployed groups. There was no plant,for example, they had no trade union; they had to create organization, they did engage in demonstration and so on, but found other forms of negotiation.

MOYNIHAN: Martin Luther King does better than General Coxey.

MAYER: The suffragette movement was that unorganized, I dare say.

PARSONS: I wonder if Dr. Levi would mean that the course of the law is sometime going to impose more and more restrictions on previous freedoms of groups who stand in the way of the equalization trend? Is that the broad point of view? In other words, bus companies can't discriminate even though it's private property. Well, that is a public utility. Anything open to public accomodation is not, can't give their own definition of an undesirable person without restriction, etc., over a very wide range.

LEVI: What I am concerned about, I think Paul Freund suggested it, is that I think the formal law will incorporate many of these aspirations, but I don't think it will make the actual changes, and I think the expectations of the community with which one is dealing will be frustrated and will believe that a continuation of the present kind of tactics will be effective. My guess is that these will be drastically curbed and with all kinds of unfortunate consequences of one kind or another. I don't say more unfortunate than their not occurring, but this is going to, it seems to me, create a social problem of great significance, which is something which ought to be taken into account.

MERTON: If we summarize a part of the discussion of the past 15 minutes or so, we have shifted our attention to the restraints on some current activities that have been initiated to deal with the problem. I think we ought to perhaps consider the implications of such an emphasis. I realize that we are shifting from one emphasis to another, but if this volume or series of volumes, whatever you have in mind, were inadvertently to have an emphasis on the value constraints, the moral constraints, the social constraints, the sources of resistance, so that the volume could be read in effect by those who read it selectively, and say that the Negro must be contained and that the Negro movement is getting out of hand, and if you really stop to think about it, the alternatives are severely restricted and limited. Then, I should think, perhaps the most avid reader of that publication would be Malcolm X. That is to say, I think it goes back to the very early part of our discussion, whether the intent would be to think of alternative strategies within the real situation that are open as agreed upon objectives. If we, in an effort to diagnose those realities, emphasize the obstacles and the restraints and so on, there could be an imbalance in the resulting volume which might very easily be misunderstood. It could be interpreted as an effort to sap the energies, almost a plot to sap the energies of grass roots movements. Thus we would be presented as the white liberals of the American Academy who are engaged in rationalizing not the status quo, but the future status. This I think could be inadvertently--

FREUND: You're putting a little unfair emphasis on the point. I didn't understand the point to be that these protest movements had to be curbed because of the rule of law.

As I saw it, at any rate, it was rather the other way around, that the law must find ways and other instruments of social control, find ways of satisfying the legitimate demands of the Negroes for participation in all forms of American life, if we are going to conserve the rule of law, which we presumably want to do. Otherwise, there will be almost intolerable pressures, not just as a matter of sheer force, but as a matter of ethical claims, to distort the rule of law because of the blockages where they should not be; in other words, we have to judge these things by the alternatives available, and we know it is one thing to say, because white people can't throw themselves into the street, Negroes can't throw themselves in the street. That's the rule of law; but if you ask a question, if the same thing is true about voting or this or that, as the reciprocity of duty and writing, then you begin to have trouble justifying your rule of law, and this seems to me a perfectly legitimate inquiry or point of view and seems to me not anti-liberal or "Uncle Tom" or anything of the sort, but rather thoughtful.

LEVI: Well, I certainly haven't been trying to help Malcolm X or anything. We were invited to look into some crystal ball as to future, and I think the problem that we are talking about is a real one. You know you can turn it whichever way you wish. There is a collision course at the moment, and I think it is an actual one, and I suppose if one wishes to think of the future of these movements and the future of the law's response, this is the kind of thing that has to be taken into account; that is all I meant to say.

MAYER: Haven't we gone full circle back to Mr. Moynihan's question, because it seems to me the answer to all this is, how do we facilitate upward mobility on the part of the Negroes with the minimum amount of trauma or concern, and we get back to the problem which we decided not to pursue further. We do have geographic distribution, for instance, in our recruitment in the universities; should we have something of the same sort for Negroes? Isn't it fairly obvious that the people who are going to be most dissatisfied are the people who have gone up already but are impeded in their further progress? Then the way the society can protect itself against this great discontent is by making it easier for these people to move up and thus thwart further resistance. It seems to me that this is a basic problem that we should address ourselves to in every field--career, housing, health and so on.

GEERTZ: When you think about alternative strategies, whether they be legal strategies or other kinds of strategies, most of us so far in thinking of analogies which we all realize are inexact--the labor movement, other ethnic groups and their earlier adjustment to our society, Indians on the reservations, and so on--it seems to me one useful thing you could do is to realize, to look at the contrast between the Negro movement and these near analogies--the labor movement is obviously different from the Negro movement; there are lots of others. The people who were sitting down in factories wanted recognition of the union; the sort of things the Negroes want are so much more diffused and more multiple that the comparison breaks down. How the earlier ethnic groups came into a different society, different period in history, this has already been mentioned, about unskilled labor and so on, that part of it was brought out a bit, but there are lots of differences between even the nature of these kinds of ethnic groups and the Negroes, which I would not on an impulse call for reasons I won't go into here. What the differences are might really enlighten us to some of the different directions it will take, whether in terms of legal institutionalization or anything else, and if one looks at Indians on the reservations and the kind of policies that kept them on the reservations that Mr. Handlin referred to, then one thinks about the difference in population sizes involved here and the kind of great discontinuity between Indian culture and the white American culture, the American culture which does not exist among Negroes, which is another reason why they are not an ethnic group in many ways.

All these analogies that we keep trying to think about a very special and, I think, unique problem, are very useful, but I think we ought to turn the analogy both ways to what is similar but also to what is really contrasted about them, because in the contrast there may come out some idea about different modes or alternate strategies, possible futures which will be different.

LEVI: It is not separate from the problem that was raised before, namely preferential treatment, because what is being suggested here is that there should be one law about sit-downs for Negroes and quite another law for sit-downs of other people--now really. If you can have a powerful argument and philosophical base which is persuasive and and differential and preferential treatment, why I suppose the law may respond to that. This is a philosophical question, and there is a question whether you predict whether this is going to be persuasive.

HANDLIN: We already have signs of that collision, not only in the courts, in the fact that the resistance movements are adopting the tactics of the Negro movement, and you have the taxpayers, and the Parents Associations having parallel sit-ins, and so on. At a certain point if the tactics spread you have got collision.

PARSONS: I just wanted to suggest that it can be a very important distinction between giving preferential treatment in certain basic, legal rights and giving subsidies in favor of improving opportunity; subsidies given specifically for the education of Negroes is very different from allowing Negroes to give sit-downs that wouldn't be allowed to--

LEVI: And one reason it is, is that I suspect the subsidy for improving opportunities for Negroes would never have to be put in those terms.

HUGHES: Well, you could put it in terms of poor people, poor schools. Is there anyone seriously opposed to having the basic legal and philosophical issues here brought out and discussed, the probability of something happening if certain kinds of action are carried on? Surely there can't be anyone who would think it would be a bad thing to do that.

FREUND: As a matter of fact, if you are interested in the effect on the law and on the courts, my guess is that a good analysis of a philosophical sort about preferences and quotas and the meaning of equality, would be at least as useful and fruitful as empirical data. What judges are searching for is a theoretical framework and they are going to have to face up to it.

HUGHES: About 20 years ago when Professor Harold Hunt was our superintendent of schools in Chicago, he had an advisory committee, of which Louis Wirtz was chairman, and of which I was a member, and Hauser the research man, and the whole drive was to have the Chicago school system become color blind. They wanted there to be no such thing as Negro. It must not exist, you just must not know it. And the interesting thing was that this has been completely reversed, and now they ask one to recognize the Negroes and you count them. At that time the whole emphasis was that you were not allowed to know that anybody was a Negro and you were not allowed to have any statistics that mentioned it, and I think that you've got to take account of this reversal and what it means in all action to understand the thing. It is moving toward the minority thing, with rights of groups, etc. and certain tendencies of that kind.

GRAUBARD: We have reached the hour of six and I think we ought to break up, but may I say that the last point that was raised by Professor Freund is one that I would hope that we could start with tomorrow morning. That is, it seems to pose the question of what sort of efforts might be most usefully done at once.

Sessions III & IV

GRAUBARD: I had the distinct impression that the group wishes the discussion to go on with a few more presentations of the sort that we had yesterday. One subject that we touched on again and again but never treated explicitly was one that Erik Erikson spoke to us about and perhaps could speak to us now about.

ERIKSON: The fact is, as Dr. Graubard put it, you start in the morning and later on you get to the hard facts, meaning that I have to speak on the subject of identity. Everybody is talking about it; it comes up in almost every remark, and maybe one could make it somewhat more complete as to what it is as a psychological force or whatever you call it. I would like to talk particularly on some aspect of it which seems to me to be outstandingly important in the Negro problem, that is the relationship of positive and negative identity. I would like to talk first about negative identity, and then positive identity, and then I will discuss the relationship of the two.

Now, when I write about things outside clinical observation, it becomes impressionistic, and few books bridge the clinical and social science using the concept of identity as a bridge, and in the Negro problem it is sometimes not a very good bridge. But the Negro problem offers me a chance to be a little more systematic about it. This is based on clinical impressions; that means of course that it is basic in episodical observation, and the question is to what extent can episodical observation be representative observation. And I should like to start with a very sad little story. It's about a little four-year-old Negro girl in Pittsburgh, where I use to visit regularly to observe the children. Every morning she came, very well dressed, very clean, not dressed for play at all, but for a party. She would stand in front of the mirror, take soap and wash her face over and over again, and people got worried about what she was going to do to her skin, so I said to her, you do not need to wash your face that often. Then she started to put soap on the mirror, and started washing the mirror. Then she was again deflected in this nice nursery school way. Someone finally had to give her paint instead of soap. Then she , in an almost temper tantrum way, filled one sheet after another with black and brown color. One day she brought a picture which she said was really good, and it was a white sheet with apparently nothing on it until we saw that the sheet was completely covered with white color. And that was the "good picture." This would be a clinical example from which you could draw any conclusions you want to. Compared with many other items I've observed over the years it taught me something about this girl trying to erase--this was an integrated school you see--to erase the difference between herself and the others.

PARSONS: She was the only Negro in the school?

ERIKSON: No, she was one of several. But you can go into her case history and see why she was the one who expressed it in this way. But what she did express was pretty clear. I was down at Howard University and some of the things that I am saying this morning I said down there. We had some discussions there with these young--what would you call them, volunteers for non-violent integration--and the following incident occurred. I mentioned the observation of a little colored boy who watched Western movies and identified with the white cowboy hero to a point, but they then see themselves as Negroes riding the same way, and something does not fit and they do not want to look anymore. This seemed a bit outlandish until one of these young people said, "Can you imagine what it means for us to look at television and then identify in a sexual way with a white man making love to a white woman and then realize that this is something we cannot enjoy, cannot think of?" I think that this is what I would call identity confusion. It is naturally developmentally very strong in adolescence and results in any number of forms of action. It was interesting to me at the discussion at Howard that the organizers of that meeting called it a discussion of pro-social action amongst the young Negroes. It obviously means to say anti-social action that is pro something, or an ideal is pro-social action, but why get into this whole thing of what is pro-social action and what is anti-social action, and to what extent the young people who get into this thing know that they are doing something for something and against something else, and what is more important, what do they identify with? And it is necessary for us to ask what is more conscious and what is less conscious, always assuming dynamically that there can be two levels. In other words, one can be very much pro-social and identify with a goal, and yet be anti-social to some extent, depending on what one does not learn. Another example of identity confusion at the moment, of course, would be violent and non-violent action, and between mob action and the action of the heroic individual or the individual who acts upon his own conscience. And then the question would come: Where do Negro youths, or Negroes in general, get positive identity images? The whole question of integration is one that brings up that if you ask what does it mean to each individual person, you can not overlook that one must ask what is to be integrated with what. There was one very touching moment when a girl at Howard said that everyone talks of integration but in a way I don't want to be integrated, and the example she used--and this is the thing I wanted to bring up in the discussion--are these things that are close to experience. She said, "The way my mother laughed and the way I laugh-- I wouldn't want that integrated out of me. In other words, if I have to sacrifice that, then I would rather not be integrated." So the question comes up, is that an ethnic thing? Could one call it ethnic? Does the Negro have a positive ethnic identity to fall back on, or to preserve or cultivate, as other ethnic groups have? I think some of us would doubt that that were so, without a land, without a language, without relatives somewhere else except, of course, Africa which they have to come back to--and the question arises, is the Negro supposed to be less a Negro? Well, admittedly within himself he has a very strong white conflict; at the moment, what are the elements of that white identity? And for many I am sure integration has meant and does mean integrating away from what they were as children and what their people were, and integrating into the dominant white types, and the question arises into what kind of types were they to integrate. And there must be books on this, and I would appreciate it very much if we could get the references, books which discuss openly and in Negro fiction in an implicit way, what are the various infantile images that the Negro has of himself. I mean such things as "honey chile." That has something to do with what was said yesterday: that is the particular kind of structure, whether it is implicit or explicit, whether the sociologists give it a negative or a positive term, it exists. I don't want to bring in slavery or plantation life, but there is no doubt that at the time when the Negro man could not provide an identity for the Negro mother and Negro children, they unofficially banded together and established the "honey child" identity as one with which every child is born and is worth something on that basis alone, and it does not depend on any initiative or social status which I am sure that many white children have taken advantage of in getting a positive identity, that is just being loved because one is a child. And there is another story about the little colored boy who drove his bicycle toward a white girl, and for this he was beaten within an inch of his life because he had to learn that this was one gesture that had to be erased despite the fact that it was perfectly all right until that one moment. When you reach a certain stage, and I would call it the phallic stage, certain things, even indications of certain things, are wrong. This is what he had to learn. This is what I said before about the Negro boy watching television. So there you have the dirty and the sadistic Negro. And then again you find in Negro fiction, you find descriptions of Negroes standing around street corners and for hours enjoying swearing and anal language, and calling each other by anal names and laughing about it. This self-characterizing and the overdoing of the negative identity--that is common among Negroes.

PARSONS: That is not unknown among white lower class adolescents.

ERIKSON: Every item I mentioned I imagine you are thinking also happened somewhere else. Now the question is--to what extent does it happen more systematically, more faithfully, because obviously you can as an adolescent go through a stage of experimenting with your negative identity. If, then, a positive one is waiting for you, re-enforced by employment and the other things we will talk of later, by occupational images, then this negative phase is a very different thing, dynamically. And this is what I want to speak of next.

There are many more images that are positive and negative at the same time. Now, one we know from our Negro friends who are intellectuals is that you get a compulsive, overly restrained, highly intellectual Negro who fits into intellectual white society. And you find some who fit into artistic white society. But how they feel about each other when they do fit, and feel about themselves is something they can talk about only on rare occasions. Then there comes the relationship between the positive and the negative. And there one has to realize just what I try to say right now; mainly, obviously everybody within himself has to balance a positive and a negative identity. One cannot be without the other. And it is in adolescence that positive and negative images are played out one against the other, where very often of course adolescents will do something which I call "totalistic," which is to make a sudden total choice, and make out of your negative identity your positive one. You find that with the beatnik, for example, who in every way represents what he has learned is least acceptable to his family and to his cohorts. Now he puts it on really thick and totalizes the whole thing, and with each other they would emphasize that this is really the only thing to be in the whole of society; obviously they are existentially inferior. Now this totalistic term is in adolescence; you find it very strongly in the Negro, it leaves two things open. By totalistic I would mean either a return to a negative identity or almost something of a kind of conversion experience such as Negroes have at this moment. Suddenly in action, or in preparation for action, they have this total image of what it would be like to feel good about being a Negro, which ends with them calling themselves "black." This term has now real punch to it, because it is so overdone at times that you know underneath there is still the split. But this transfiguration of a word that meant everything bad before and now becomes suddenly the core of what is good, this is something to be watched. Say that you have that on both sides; then also on the social scale, obviously the Black Muslims are the creation of a positive Negro identity for which they have to reach out, as most totalistic movements have to do, into the distant past or into some foreign country. They have to have a uniform, they have to have mystical ideas of some sort. This we talked about also. But the main thing is that there is a total decision now that the Negro is good and all white people are bad. And they won't accept any shadings any more. Now you have the same thing on the other hand among the racists, and yet both would indicate somehow that the other identity is also underneath, for example, the racists would have strong inferiority feelings of one sort or another. And it is under such conditions that violence threatens most strongly; this has to be watched as integration proceeds, especially in the north, that certain ethnic groups, as was pointed out yesterday, find themselves suddenly endangered, ethnic groups who may be even better organized because they are ethnic groups, and, as you said yesterday, more than southern whites are, and then violence threatens. I hope you don't think that I am going to in any way deny the political or economic reasons for such violence or for such self-defense, but I would say that the defense of an identity is in danger and it is slipping, and this is something which contributes to organized violence in a very important way. To what extent does one group need another group to fortify its own positive identity needs, to make a negative one out of the other. This has happened. Then we must ask to what extent groups that are only marginally ethnic, i.e. the Negro, and before that in many countries, the Jew, who is, let us say, primarily a metropolitan Jew, who cannot say anymore that he comes from a particular country or area or has identified with any particular language, he has lost all of this, to what extent certain groups may creep along ethnically, less organized groups being the scapegoat. To what extent for example, in the south the Negro absolutely is necessary to the white man to build up what now exists as an image of the white man, so that a great danger arises when that is attacked; again, a transitional stage in which that image would have to be replaced by another one, and that would be my final point.

If one would really think into the future, one might consider something which, in my thinking now, is a more inclusive identity, because it seems to me that in all the identity struggles of our time, and we must see that they are going on all over the world, apparently the best solution is one where two groups that have previously been hostile and have lived off the negative image of the other find more in an inclusive identity than in one identity over the other. I mean, having gone to school in Germany, for example, if I see the differences now between what the Germans and the French think about each other, then suddenly a European or a West European identity becomes possible. I can see the power of this sort of thing if it is, of course, supported by the hard facts of economic and political development, or maybe initiated by it. In that sense I think one could think about the future of race relations in this country by discussing what kind of more inclusive identity might exist between the two groups, the funny thing being, as you said yesterday, the more you have the inclusive identity, the more you can desert your old identity. In a more inclusive identity the Negro could be a Negro, could particularly in the changing conditions of the world as it is now, acknowledge African descent, and I wish someone incidentally would write something about the relationship of the American Negro to his African descent, but it (i.e. the relationship) could be included in the more inclusive one. The question is only which one will defeat the other. There have been many problems that have been repudiated by Negro youths, for example, the middle class image has been one such inclusive image. For example, in other countries the proletariat image would be the more inclusive thing that could bring two races together. In America the middle class is very dominant as the image giver.

PARSONS: I think that this last jump is an exceedingly important one. American society has unusual assets for adjusting its point of view because of its history of ethnic beginnings and the relative success with which inclusion has come about. I don't think we should overlook, as I just mentioned yesterday, that this includes cases of groups which have had a history of sharp antagonism, most notably the religious groups. I was brought up in a kind of Protestant atmosphere that really regarded Catholicism as pretty close to absolute evil, and it was a pretty strongly set attitude. I think that it is truly remarkable the degree of integration which has occurred. Perhaps I am quite aware of a Boston symbolization of this that took place in February in the memorial Requiem Mass for Mr. Kennedy, and the remarkable thing about that was that the Boston Symphony Orchestra played the Mozart Requiem in the Roman Catholic cathedral at an actual Mass conducted by the Cardinal Archbishop of Boston. It had never been played at an actual religious service any time before. If there is a single citadel which stands for Boston Protestantism, the Boston Symphony would certainly be it. It is indicative of a more inclusive identity.

MERTON: I suppose what you would have us do this morning, Steve, is to continue with our free associations for a short time. I will give five free associations in connection with what Erik Erikson has said. One, which Erik has suggested, is that this line of inquiry into identity and identity confusion and a pattern of totalized identity, where one becomes not only first and foremost a "black," exclusively black, with all other identities being subordinated, that these patterns are derived from clinical inquiry; you thought you could see a bridge between that and sociological inquiry. That put it into my mind that very similar ideas have been developed on the sociological side of this non-existent fence between the two disciplines. In the work of Willard Waller you will find, going back 25 years, that he felt the notion of what we call "counter mores" among groups who have been repudiated by a dominant group, but then established their own set of mores, which are, as it were, the negative image of the prevailing mores. And I rather suspect that that is one line of theoretical integration between your clinical inquiry and social patterns that have been recurrent. In connection with that, when the bottom rail tends to make itself the top-most rail, that pattern has been identified historically many times as taking an epithet that has been invidious in the past and then proudly assuming it as your very own. The Quakers represented that. And one can identify many more.

I should think that if in any part of this inquiry the Black Muslims are dealt with as specimens of a more general problem the really confusing aspects of the Black Muslims is that they are a complete repudiation of the whites and white culture on the one hand, and their almost complete acceptance of an extreme bourgeois cultural pattern, all for self-discipline, the emphasis on grit, a certain kind of asceticism, the kind of neatness of dress that is almost a caricature of the old-time bourgeois, and the question of whether that doesn't exemplify a certain kind of ambivalence that is implied in much of what you said. Then this pattern of dependence on the enemy. . . that is to say, that the character of one's own culture, one's own social organization, is partly dependent on the conflict with some other group; and as you eliminate the enemy you get a disintegration; you have what I think is a beautiful novel on this subject by a young Negro who happens to be a graduate of Harvard of two years ago, William Kelley, called A Different Drummer, the title obviously taken from the Thoreau passage, where the theme is a very simple one. What happens to a hypothetical second state when every Negro leaves it, and his analysis of this fantasy I found very productive.

Then one last question which would be suggested by what you said, though I confess that I don't see any logical connection; would we once consider a certain kind of mobility among the Negro population in this country and have a focus on it? I am referring to the very conspicuous mobility of Negroes in certain sports in which they gain pre-eminence, and in which you have a strange situation where the whites are scarcely competitive with Negroes, where the pre-eminence of Negroes is so overwhelming that the whites have simply not been able to measure up. We know this in a very general way in track, in baseball, basketball, and boxing, and the contrast between those sports on the one hand and the realms of sports such as tennis, golf, handball, where the pattern has not occurred at all. Is there any significance to the fact that certain lines of activity were opened up; you apparently had a double process of almost, in the case of boxing, a new form of segregation, that is to say, originally the Negro was not admitted to boxing at all, so you had all whites, and now you have reached the point where it is almost the reverse. Just the sheer social dynamics of such a transformation, which may have no great historical significance in terms of shaping our society, but it is a specimen of a remarkable change that might be worth looking into and analyzing.

SCHMIDT: Isn't boxing a poor man's job? It was the poor Irish first, then the poor Jews, and now the poor Negroes.

HUGHES: In boxing, Negroes have the advantage over Cubans and Puerto Ricans, who are too little; they can only get into the light weights, but they can't get into the heavy weights.

They are too short. They can start but they can't finish the cycle.

MERTON: In posing this perhaps there is a tangential point, i.e., it might arise with the race in question but not emerge elsewhere. The differential opportunity structure. For example, if we talk about some being poor man's sports and others being rich man's sports and others being rich man's playthings, skiing or crewing or playing handball, and yet what is there about handball that is intrinsically related to wealth? It is a cultural tradition that has led to this result, and this could symbolize opportunity structures in more important spheres.

HUGHES: There are two or three theses on Negroes in sports.

PARSONS: I think Bob will remember that there are a good many studies of Harvard undergraduate life in the 1930's, and one thing that came out very interestingly about sports was that anybody could make the football team regardless of his social status or origin; you might say that Harvard couldn't afford to waste football talent, but crew was strictly limited to final club groups, and they wouldn't tolerate anybody but a member of that socially elite group. I don't know how to explain that; certain sports were simply socially elite and others weren't.

KAYSEN: But Harvard is much better at crew than it is at football.

HANDLIN: I was very much interested in this whole discussion of identity confusion and its problems. I thought I would like to throw out a few questions which I have worried about, which are I think still in need of not only answers but satisfactory accumulation of data. I found it interesting. . . the kind of Negro sub-fiction that is very revealing on this problem. I think we tend to be influenced too much in our estimates by the books that are written either by whites about Negroes, or by Negroes for a white audience, or for an audience that would include whites. Even a popular magazine like EBONY, which is directed primarily at a Negro audience, still has certain kinds of inhibitions because it is seen by whites. The material that appears in a level of writing below that, which is really totally directed at the Negroes in the newspapers and in magazines like TAN, various kinds of true confessions type magazines, I think have a good deal to say about this.

One question that occurs and has troubled me is the salience of color as an element in the identification process of achieving Negro identity, and whether the mere blackness of the Negro's skin, to the extent that it is black, and it isn't always, is in itself a sufficiently differentiating element that sets them off from other groups. I think it's very interesting, for instance, in this context to think of what has happened to a much smaller group like Japanese-Americans since the war. Here you began with intensely hostile feeling on the eve of war; the war experience did not help it, and yet in the years since 1945 a consciousness of "yellow" as a factor in other peoples' thinking about Japanese Americans and in the thinking of the Japanese Americans themselves about their position, has seemed, so far as I can tell, to have faded completely. The whole issue of Negro color and the connotations that people attach to blackness to me is full of confusion both historically and currently. On a certain level we attach negative connotations to blackness, but, for instance, not to "chocolate" color, which does not have a negative connotation, and yet what is the difference? And if you look at the Negroes, are they black or chocolate color? Historically, this may not be terribly interesting, but the whole point at which the awareness of people of Africa at the moment as black is one that is very puzzling to me. The word "black" didn't mean "black" in English until it was attached to Africans. The derivation of "black" comes from the German word "bloch," and in the fourteenth century it meant white and when Englishmen at that time wished to refer to something we would call black, they would use the word "swarth." You would have referred to a black person then as "swarthy" and not as black.

BELL: Now in England when they report the Negroes moving into an area they say the Schwartzes are moving in. This is the slang now in English newspapers.

HANDLIN: Black becomes black just at the point of contact with Africa. I haven't the vaguest idea why this happened, and of the continuing buildup in subsequent centuries of a whole set of connotations that are attached to blackness and now referred to as a Negro. I was interested when Erik was talking about television. Of course, the nature of media makes a difference. It was perfectly possible for Booker T. Washington to read about George Washington or Paul Revere and get a capacity for empathy, and for identification, that he would not have had if he saw these things on television or in movies. But in any case I think the whole question of color salience and why it has become of such critical significance in the case of the Negroes apart from other groups is one that baffles me.

I was also interested in the second question which came out of the interesting discussion of clinical material which is confirmed by us. I think that you must know of the work that Robert Cole is doing with Negro children. One of the things which interests me is which ones are confused. You take a group in a school. Some of them yield to these disturbing and confusing elements and others do not. I don't think we know enough about the factors which will lead to a breakdown in one case and not in another. Whether they are personal or social, certainly they are significant and may be related to this question of the family to which we refer again and again. And as I said yesterday, there are many features about the family of the Negro that remain puzzling. I would like to see brought together materials which exist on the experience of families under the process of urbanization in different parts of the world, say among the Africans in South Africa. I know there is a study of British Guiana and compared with what is happening to the Negro family in the city, the situation there, and certainly in South Africa, however difficult the position of the Africans is, they were not subject to slavery or the plantation system in the form that here may have disrupted family life, the position of the father, etc. It would be interesting to speculate on the reason why people like the Chinese, under a shock of comparable kinds of moves and experiences, have managed to maintain a very tight family life, and never have this problem of identity roles, etc.

The third point I think is perhaps most significant for our purposes, and that is the implications of these problems for whatever can be done to direct the process of integration and to give it a positive rather than a negative effect and here we come into a realm where choices may be possible and where decisions about tactics and strategy may make a difference about what happens. Erik asked, and very properly, what do Negroes integrate to, and he pointed to efforts to convert negative to positive images, etc. It is interesting how many of these efforts, which are seen in the extreme in the Black Muslims, involve an obliteration of the past, of past experiences of the whole group, which has interesting counterparts in other groups where everybody's ancestors were once kings; and it involves also the need to create, as it were, a fictitious paternity. The original Black Muslims in the '30's, when they were still a small sect, referred to themselves as Asiatics. It was not until after the War that Islam was connected with Africa rather than with Asia, and it was interesting in the '30's in Detroit, when these people were first getting started, how they insisted that they were not Africans but Asiatics. Now they have come around I think because of the changes in Africa. I think one of the things that concerns us is the alternative ways of converting negative to positive kinds of identity, and I was very much interested in Erik's analysis of the need to make a negative image of others in order to establish a positive identity of one's own. Two things occur to me. First, what would be the cost to other groups which now depend to the extent that they do upon the existence of their negative image of this minority? The whole existing, or a large part of the existing social order is propped up by the set of negative attitudes toward the Negro. What will happen when you pull it out? This may create kinds of danger that would be very ominous. And the other is whether it's possible for a group, particularly a negative group, to convert the negative sense of identity into a positive one without making negative estimations of some other group, whether there is an alternative. There are analogies; they are not quite comparable. Bob spoke of the Quakers; the Quakers did achieve this without making a negative group of anyone else. They achieved it, not by obliterating their past, but by discovering some general relevance in their own experience that would apply to the whole society in which they were involved. In other words, by establishing for themselves a special mission in relation to the whole society, which gave them a justification both for maintaining their identity and yet a legitimate role in reference to the whole society. I think there have been comparable tendencies in other ethnic groups, and conceivably among the Negroes, although I say this hesitantly; conceivably it might be a case of saying that not by rejecting their past as slaves but by recognizing and emphasizing and by establishing--as in the old days of Booker T. Washington and Up From Slavery--a set of values which certainly would have wide application to the rest of their society. There might be the basis for that kind of identifying factor that would permit a kind of integration which would not only recognize the role of the group in relationship to the rest of society, but would recognize the value of their own ethnic experience. I once argued this point with a Negro, and I said to him, "Is it better to be the descendant of a slave or the descendant of a slaveholder?" (Many of them are both.) In any case, this is a point that would be worth pursuing.

ERIKSON: One thing that should be, might be considered because you mentioned Cole, who has been studying Negro children, and probably most of you have read by now something of his in Harper's or the Atlantic, and we have studied in fact the impact of disturbance, their experiences on Negro children and found very little neurotic disturbance, which of course he went down there to find, having been trained in Boston, and he's been working hard on this to see the dynamic relationships. What does a Negro child, even a rather small one, feel when he walks through all that yelling? When you speak of children, there is one thing that might be interesting to study, namely, at what age are these things laid down that you are talking about? There is an interesting experience in Germany, where Negro soldiers have left babies from German women, where, in fact, a colored baby is the most beautiful; Germans who had annihilated Jews found that colored babies were the most beautiful things in the world, and with no prejudice whatsoever. But, then in the nursery schools, there comes suddenly an age, just that age when that little colored girl started to wash her face and wash the mirror; the Negro children would look into the mirror and see they were different, and the German children would become different and call them dirty and black. Now, what combination of cognitive developments is necessary first of all. And secondly, what self-images, at what point--obviously it has something to do with the building up of a dirty image of yourself which from then on you have to live with--this process takes place of calling somebody else dirty; there must be something in child development which is critical for that. And then if I may first mention one point about this critical point, this finding of a new identity. Of course the man one thinks of on a grandiose scale is Ghandi. . . what he did for India, where he made out of the non-militant character of most Indians, as compared with the military castes, which is a different thing, a movement in which non-violence would become in fact the sign of inner strength. Now there are relationships here for example, where the peacefulness of the Negro, his ability to accept pain, is turned under certain conditions into a strength which then is felt even by the whites, strangely superior and something which paralyzes you, the way for example the English feel in India. Wherever one thinks in these terms, one also has to consider, especially within the next ten years, that this is very very dangerous business when it does not work, or when it falls apart. I mean the race riots in India which followed Ghandi. I don't think one can consider such disruptions as completely accidental disturbances of a positive identity process, and if any hindrance occurs, then the thing can fall apart and violence threatens even more than before.

PARSONS: Well, I just thought it might be relevant to call attention to a cultural source of this negative identity which I think is still with us, though it isn't very saving. It was brought clearly to my attention by a very notable study of a South African sociologist who was here, that very clearly in Boer South Africa the condition of the Dutch Reformed Church has identified the Calvinistic split between the elect and the reprobates with the racial line, so that the blacks are those who are predestined to damnation, and it is therefore their religious duty to keep them subordinated and disciplined. Now, in fundamentalist Protestantism in this country and the South, this pattern of thinking is still active. I think it is probably latent over a very much wider range than those groups who would explicitly state something to this effect. That is, the general tendency which goes with our Protestant heritage and is much less prominent in the Catholic heritage, to dichotomize the population in terms of religious value, and states where this does get identified with the color line can be very deeply resistant.

PETTIGREW: I would like to comment just briefly on what Mr. Handlin mentioned, and then comment on the general presentation. The idea of the special experience of Negroes being used as a positive, and in the Quaker analogy, a mission, I think Baldwin has picked up this and made more of it than anyone else. But Baldwin speaks to whites; I don't think he has a large influence on Negroes. I think they feel that he does a good job with whites and leave him to that. But it is at least a popular idea among some Negro intellectuals; the idea of South Africa as a family example, I think, is bad, because by law the African males coming in off the locations and reservations are split from their families. They live in all-male dormitories, etc., and have to leave their families back on the land. They are stripped of the land because they have to pay taxes in currency and they can't get the money any other way than to come to the city. South Africa needs the labor, but does not want the family, so they have family destruction in South Africa far more severe actually than among Negro Americans.

One positive thing in the negative stereotype of Negroes, I think, for many Negro males, is the sex symbol. Ken Clark, certainly one of the leading Negro social scientists, always says that it's fine to do away with many aspects of the Negro's stereotypes, but please don't change the stereotype about the great potency of Negro males. He says that he's been able to live his life proudly because of that one little aspect of the stereotype and "I don't want it changed!" You also mentioned Cole's work, which shows great resources of Negro children in these integrated situations, and in our identifying with them, we think it must be hell that they are going through, and it is a form of hell, but their resources are much stronger than maybe ours would be in the same circumstance, which is Cole's main finding, which interests me. But I always remember interviewing the nine Negro children who went to Central High School in Little Rock, certainly one of the most serious situations to have to go through in the integration process so far; and I remember one Negro girl who really came to life at this point, and when asked what she was getting out of this integrated experience, the way she put it was, "Well, now I know that there are stupid white kids, too." (ERIKSON: How old was she?) She was fifteen. Obviously, her view of whites had been a very, very positive one, you know. . . all whites were bright. She was middle class, but not, I would say, lower middle class.

But that does lead me to the other thing that I wanted to mention--skin color. The skin color variable has been mentioned here; obviously, it is one of the strongest variables you can use in the studies of Negro personality. Of course, it is confounded with class for historical reasons obviously; another reason is that the lighter skinned Negroes do tend to be more often middle class. It is possible that this becomes a very strong correlate of, for instance, relations to Africa. The only Negroes we've found, working-class and middle-class samples in Roxbury, who really strongly identified with Africa, who agree with items about Africa, independent African countries helping the Negro American with his struggle, are the very darkest of Negroes; and it seems that Africa serves as a very important identity function for them, but not so much for light-skinned Negroes, at least, so far as we can determine. Africa seems to be practically irrelevant in predicting their reactions to it; the positive aspect of the middle-class inclusiveness in American society. . . I think the term "American" adds much to this. It has always disturbed me that we say American Indians, American Negroes, and we emphasize Indian and Negro, and use American as an adjective. But we say Irish American and Italian American, and we emphasize American for the ethnics, and I, along with some others, make a big thing of trying to say Negro American, Negro Southerner, or Negro Northerner and try to stress the American, Northerner or Southerner. But right at this time Negroes want to stress "Negro." But this is a more inclusive term which I hope catches on; I hope, for instance, that the Academy will use the term "Negro American" in its titling rather than the more usual term American Negro.

This leads me to the final point, which connects, at least for me as a social psychologist, connects what we have been talking about this morning with the force of yesterday's discussion on the more social level. That is the concept of role in the role of the Negro in terms of white expectations of how the Negro should behave and how Negroes grow into this role, which is where, at least for me, it offers a link in what we've been talking about for the last two days, and this is where the negative image comes from. It's not just color but it is the behavioral pattern which the Negro has to live out for survival; and this is where I think the protests that the Negro is now engaging in are so therapeutic. I really wasn't very much worried about whether the March on Washington changed senatorial votes or not; I rather thought it wasn't going to, but I thought it was marvelous therapy for 200,000 people marching down Pennsylvania Avenue for no other reason than that it turns the Negro role, so-called--passive, stupid, slow-- all the rest--irresponsible--it turns the Negro role upside down, turns it on its head, and I think the SNIK kids who were involved in your discussion of the shift from negative to positive identity sensed this in having had no intellectual tools by which to describe it, and were excited by what you told them at Howard precisely because you were giving them some tools that articulated very much their feeling and particularly their feelings for having been publicly committed in protest, which I think gives them a new insight on their own identity problems, but also on how they can change it.

ERIKSON: May I say something. You have talked about this repeatedly, and I couldn't remember having talked to them about this, and in fact I would say now, I wouldn't. It must be somebody else--I talked with them about other things and maybe they felt that that corresponded to what was going on. One difficulty which we have to discuss here which comes up with the use of such terms; now we have to call it something, but sometimes terms take hold because they seem also to express what the thing feels like. So that, everyone of us knows that every Harvard student feels that he didn't have an identity crisis he would have no chances. And the other kind, the militant type, is the one who says he has not got one and by God he won't. In other words, what comes with the use of such terms by the people who are in the middle of the question--that's what I meant yesterday by saying that, good or bad, when you said they were impressed by this, does it give them a terminological hand which actually is no particular help in continuing the fight necessarily? We must discuss that.

GRAUBARD: I don't want to change gears too dramatically and yet I do. We raised yesterday a whole series of economic questions that seem to me did not really develop quite fully, mostly because the session was not long enough. I have asked Mr. Fein if he would say a few more words about the sorts of concerns that he has in this field.

FEIN: Before I do I want to mention an interesting aspect of the Civil Rights March, to me at least, in terms of identity. For some considerable time after the march, over a period of months, I had a few occasions to be in groups of Negroes, and the conversation was always quite interesting to me along the lines of where in the crowd were you on the day of the March? Much like the conversation that developped here last night about where were you at the time of the assassination. For months this continued--where were you at the time of the March? So this was a very real symbol.

On the economic side, I want to tie in some of the remarks with some made yesterday. We talked a bit about trying to look at alternative courses of action, projections of what the future might be on the economic level, and I am reminded that the March on Washington was a march for Civil Rights and full employment. I take it that Randolph felt that both were very vital. This was in a sense surprising, because one might have expected the Civil Rights to be even more pre-eminent than the full employment part. I think that that title and some of the discussion yesterday and even some of the remarks today outside the realm of economics to me indicated a thread that had not been made fully explicit in our discussion, and which I think has to be made explicit. Is the Negro where he is today and where he is likely to be "x" years from now--is that a function of his being a Negro or alternatively is that a function of his being low income, poorly educated, or what have you--unskilled and so on. This keeps coming up. It comes up this morning when Talcott Parsons says that, well, low income whites use this kind of language also. It comes up in terms of employment opportunities. It comes up in terms of labor force projections, and so on. It is not, it seems to me, from the point of view of policy or from the point of view of projections a question that can remain implicit but unanswered. Clearly both things are important, but there may be proportions that change the picture considerably. Within the very small debate that has been going on among economists on this kind of thing, you can come out with rather different perspectives, so that some economists would argue that the big problem is education. Look at where the Negro is employed and what you have is a picture of a poorly educated person who simply cannot move up the occupational ladder. And yet, another group of economists would say looking at substantially the same data, that the biggest problem is not education--that is important--but the biggest problem is discrimination. Group A says education is where we have to put our emphasis; Group B says, let's take a look at the way FEPC laws work and if they do work--that really does require the prominent emphasis. I suggest that this makes, then, a rather substantial difference on policy and on projections within the limited area of employment with which I am somewhat more familiar; but obviously within a host of other areas where the question keeps coming up. I don't know how in a variety of fields one would address oneself to this. I think within employment, occupation, and things of this kind, the economists could get a handle on it. I think that it is a question that needs more attention and explicit discussion than, in fact, has been the case. I see this thread coming through, and it affects where you are going to head and the way you look at things. I'll react, but that's about all I will offer at this point.

HUGHES: Do you think the data for this economic study are in hand or do you think you will have to go out and get a good deal of new kinds of material?

FEIN: Let me put it this way. Economists using substantially the same data have come up with radically different answers. And it is possible that the data simply cannot be pushed any further. However, it is also a fact of life that economists, not very many, have addressed themselves to this problem and the few who have not addressed themselves to it in great depth or over any considerable period of time, considerable in this case being defined as more than a month, which leads me to at least the suspicion that while one might find that two months doesn't yield any more than one month, one might find something very different and it's worth the gamble.

BELL: I am a little puzzled as to why you make this an antithesis. Somebody can come along and say that the answer is both the problems. Each one re-enforces the other; I don't see really what you are getting at by confronting the problem in this particular way. Is it a matter of allocation of resources? I don't see really what follows except some theoretical niceties perhaps.

FEIN: Let me put it this way. You have Eli Ginzberg, for example, writing in the New Republic and saying discrimination, FEPC, and employment opportunities, is fifth on the list of important items. The first is education and I don't recall what the other intervening ones were. I think it makes a big difference; I think it makes this kind of difference. Aside from FEPC vs. education, aside even from how long you have to wait,--education is a long and continuing thing, it takes quite a while--it makes, I would suggest, this kind of difference; If the answer were to be more heavily weighted in the direction of discrimination, it might have something to say about your point on preferential treatment that would not occur if the answer were education. If one is concerned about changing the image that children have of where they may go, their expectations, I should think it makes some difference whether, and clearly both are involved, but whether the heavy hand of discrimination is more important than the heavy burden of under-education. I should think that if one finds that with the same levels of education the Negro is pushed down on the occupational ladder quite a bit, this would tell us something about how whites. . . what the reaction might be among kids when we say, "Your problem is going to be solved if you just get that good education." Now I am out of my area, but I should think it makes a difference in terms of the image, the role, the expectations that the Negro child would have, and I think it makes an awful lot of difference in terms of policy; it certainly makes a difference in terms of your projections and your whole setting of the Negro within the poor, or the Negro qua Negro.

HUGHES: This would be a massive research problem if anyone can get the data to do it and see the relation between what you might call discrimination--unemployment of the parent and the dropping out of school on the part of the child. You can hook up this kind of economic variable with a social variable, and it would be very nice indeed. I am really asking whether you think that would be possible.

KAYSEN: Let me comment on just that point. I am not really active in this area, but I have a strong suspicion, and I've checked a little with Moynihan, that there is a fair amount of data that could be used for this purpose which has not been exploited. We have to remember that there is here a governmental apparatus well organized to do certain kinds of work with this data. It's not like the problem of producing new field work--like let us say interviewing, which may be a large-scale, long-time effort. The BLS and census are continuously running certain kinds of surveys, and the data are available every month. What can be injected into these surveys and made available relatively quickly. . . you know there is quite a broad range here, and since, of course, the whole governmental apparatus is extremely interested in these problems, I think we have a resource in getting what might look like lots of new data relatively easily, and I think it's important to consider what we can do in that direction. And one of the things that occurs to me here that is very important, I would guess, as a possible source is that the labor department classifies every major labor market in terms of the degree of tightness of the market from "A" area to another. This is done monthly and it has been done over a long period of years. I think it is quite possible to look at pairs or sets of labor market areas which are not too dissimilar--lots of things have been happening in economic structure that make this possible--but have had dissimilar employment experiences, areas which have been "B" areas, that's high employment, and areas that have been "F" areas, that is, very high unemployment, over a period of time. I think getting into this and looking at some of the work force experience of Negroes, people with different skills and education, etc., which is a big job. The American Academy started to do it but it is a relatively small scale job in relation to what is already being done. The apparatus the way the market survey does it could within a short period of time generate some answers to some interesting questions, and this would appear to me to be quite fruitful in terms of some of the questions that Mr. Hughes raised.

MOYNIHAN: Let me just say, first, that there is nothing that the Bureau of Labor Statistics needs more than someone to suggest some decent questions to ask. I think the Federal Government has in effect facilities which are available to this table and if there are things to be done, we can do them, perhaps to a surprising degree. I just want to run through some of the points of the conversation.

First, to Tom Pettigrew, a warning on the question of the Negro American. And that is, for years in Democratic campaign headquarters in New York state, you had your nationalities committees; the original one was the Irish-American and as that long list grew longer somebody in the Irish-American committee decided that the words were in the wrong order. In 1957 they shifted it to the American-Irish Committee, and it's been making its way down the hall. I don't know whether they are progressing or not.

I think that if you want to view the Labor Department from a professional point of view, it seems to us that in terms of Dr. Erikson's fundamental question of how a more inclusive identity can be found, that the Negro revolt is providing it, surviving the more inclusive identity of religion, and you cannot be in Washington and not know that the most important thing that has happened to Civil Rights is that the churches in America have joined it, and under the general category of being Christians, you can be Negro and White because of the fundamental fact of being Christian. And a contrary point, and yet not seemingly conflicting, is that you can also be a rebel; you can be a sort of Christian rebel, an odd combination and one that is enough of a future for anyone, enough of a past for anyone. Where were you on August 28th is a perfectly good question, and I was in the march and overheard one young man say to another, you know, in twenty years from now you'll be telling your kids that we were up in front leading this thing. And why not, that's how we got all the kings of Ireland. With that kind of psychological resource, people don't need many more, I mean in terms of the question, color.

I have been sitting in on the hearings on poverty the last couple of weeks in which Adam Clayton Powell is chairman, and the bill was introduced by Congressman Lamden. Now, as any American with the minimum social sense from having read Life magazine for four weeks can tell you, all you need is to walk into that room and look at Powell and look at Lamden and you know who is of the higher social class. Powell is--he's just back from Florida, whereas Lamden is pasty-faced and gnarled and obviously had been in a textile mill most of his life. Most Americans try to get tanned, and I think the color thing can be easily taken care of. I'm very serious about that. You know, Powell always looks like a very well-to-do man because he is always tanned. But that question of employment seems to us the biggest danger. I think all things are needed for the Negroes to maintain--they have the American music, which is a magnificent achievement they have created; they have their revolt behind them; they have their leadership. The biggest question is, will the Negro community itself get pulled apart by the problems of employment? It would seem to us to be absolutely devastating, and they are not Negro problems, they are American problems generally, but their differential effect on the Negroes is potentially disastrous. I mean, every day we look at the statistics and we just groan.

I don't want to fillibuster here, but the progress of the Negro in terms of comparisons with the wages and all moved very rapidly through the Second World War up to 1947, where they reached the point where they had 54% of the wages of the whites. In the last 15 years they moved 13% in 8 years. In the last 15 years they have moved 1%. They got up to 62% around 1955 and are back to 55% today. And the relation, the experience in employment is the same. In 1947 the Negro teenagers actually had a lower rate of unemployment than white teenagers. They had a rate of about 7% and the whites had about 8%. Now in the last 15 years their 7% has grown to 28%, and the whites' 8% has grown to 14%. They are now double the white and quadruple what they were. Last year we added 30 billion dollars of GNP in the country, without adding a single additional job for teenagers. Every additional teenager that entered the work force produced an additional unemployed youth in our statistics, and we see this thing in the question of Negro illegitimacy. I think we would very much like to know how good the statistics are--are we simply getting better statistics or is, in fact, something changing, because the illegitimacy rate continues to rise.

Last year almost a quarter of the Negro children born in America were illegitimate. Now, in contrast to the kids who were in that August 28 march whose lives, it seems to me, are rather settled --they are going to have good lives-- the 25% of the kids born illegitimate, I think very likely a large proportion of them are doomed, and that particular population, for example, is turning over at such a rate that it can overwhelm the people that were in that march. We find something like 40% of the children born in Chicago, Negro children last year, if our understanding is correct, were illegitimate, and that the rate is getting higher. Ten years ago in Chicago there were 55,000 people on Aid to Dependent Children. Last year there were 185,000 and the welfare directors in Chicago say to you that it is the closing of the packing mills, packing plants, that have just thrown people out of work and wrecked the Negro family, just not getting along because of the lack of the male who can come home and be the head of the family. And all these devices of trying to keep the male around by saying, you no longer have to leave in order to get ADC payments, they leave anyway. They spend just so much time in the kitchen and then they get up and go. And that's why it seems to us that obtaining the projections on employment is fundamental, and I don't know that there is any problem on data, because what's involved is social policy and not impersonal projections. I think that Carl Kaysen could give you three alternative models; one to solve your problem and the other to make it worse, and the middle one would leave you in between; in effect, which would you choose, not which can you predict.

PETTIGREW: I remember a Negro comedian, Nipsy Russell, who on television once made the big point that he was pleased that white people all over the U. S. were using Man-Tan, and he wanted the whites to know that Negroes were using skin lighteners just as hard. He said, "We're trying to meet you half way."

To respond to Dan Bell's question about the distinction Dr. Fein is drawing, which is an arbitrary distinction of the two since they are so highly related, it is worthwhile for us to think in these terms briefly because yesterday there was a tendency for all of us, I think, or for many of us, to be using ethnic group comparisons--the Negro being the latest group to arrive in mass numbers in northern cities, and so forth, and feeling, at least on the part of some, that his rate of progress would be something like the rate of progress of previous ethnic groups. I think this is dangerous. I believe Dr. Fein was responding to that in part by this distinction, and in fact there are many things here that are unique to the Negro. There is a stigma attached to being a Negro in American society, which was, I think, the basis of what we started off with this morning, and admittedly the data on this point are not good and we could use a great deal more, hopefully with Federal resources. But there are some; the study I have in mind was mainly done by the Taeubers, not the census Taeuber but their son and daughter-in-law, in Chicago, 1961, and they are able to demonstrate fairly straightforwardly, on both economic terms and housing and residence patterns, that Puerto Ricans in Chicago, with language against them, with culture against them, and often as dark or darker than the American Negro, nevertheless, from 50 to 60 percent actually had a rate, a group rate of mobility faster than Negro Americans have had since 1920 to 1960. There is something special, then, involved with the Negro that not even the Puerto Ricans have with all these other disadvantages in terms of striving.

FEIN: Americans with Spanish surnames in Texas have an average income 31% higher than the Negro. The interesting fact is that at the same time they have an educational level on the average 3 years less than the Negro.

PARSONS: If I may just follow that point one step further, it seems to me that the aspects of the status system, particularly the level of employment, not merely the employment-unemployment line, but the level of jobs accessible through educational qualifications and so on, is so terribly important because it is the primary source of labor, or certainly a primary one. I think every bit as important as legislation, for a general upgrading process and for a closeness which can begin to break down this global stereotyping that centers in the negative identity, but they must be independently variable. If there is no independent variability, it is hopeless.

FEIN: Within the area of employment there is one sub-group that I don't think we are, in terms of projections, able to say very much about, but which I think has a good deal of interest, as I would hope, to some of the sociologists. Namely, the question of self-employment. The whole question of entrepreneurship, and I don't mean self-employment of the fellow who comes around to rake your leaves. I mean Negro stores on F Street in Washington, stores owned by Negroes. This is an outlet that other groups have had. The Negro apparently doesn't. Certainly not in the same proportions, and I think the whole question of entrepreneurship, of self-employment, is an interesting one. There is probably a story there that says something to us.

HUGHES: Well, I think there would be an interesting story. I was brought up in southern Ohio and never had my hair cut by a white man until I was about through college, and there were all sorts of little restaurants, and the unions chased them out. They chased them out of the entrepreneur group, they chased them out of the restaurants throughout, and even as far north as Chicago.

MOYNIHAN: How did they get hold of local crime? I mean, Adam Powell spends his career trying to get the Negroes to take over the policy game in Harlem. He can't, because the Jews and the Italians won't let him, and the police force doesn't run it anymore and they can't help.

GEERTZ: The time when Black Metropolis was written, the Negro policy racket was a Negro policy racket and now it's not.

HANDLIN: There are important differences there. For instance, between the Negroes and Puerto Ricans, differences within the Negro group itself. For instance, in New York a striking difference between the West Indian Negroes and the indigenous Negroes, so I think there are cultural factors involved in this.

FEIN: I think there is another interesting area, continuing this free association for another moment. At various decision levels, how much riskier are certain decisions for the Negro as opposed to other groups? Let me give a specific example. You're middle income, upper middle, maybe, and you're fairly bright and you're deciding what curriculum to take in high school;namely, the general course or the college preparatory course. And you.decide on the college preparatory course, because if you don't get a scholarship, your parents can still finance your way into college. You're Negro and/or very low income and you're fairly bright. Can you afford to make the decision to go into the college preparatory course? If you don't get a scholarship and the odds are against you because you're only fairly bright, your parents will not be able to finance it. So that the decision as to where to go in high school is pushed much further back because the risk element is much greater, the decision, therefore, more important; you stand to lose more by picking the college preparatory course because if you don't get into college, you didn't even get the vocational course. Whereas the middle income person doesn't stand to lose as much. If a scholarship doesn't appear, his parents can take care of it. I think there are a variety of decisions that all of us make that are made earlier by some groups because they are riskier, and I think it is an interesting kind of thing because it determines directions, and in a very rational way, determines them for members of that group, much as we might like to see them play with the decision, postpone the decision, act like us. They can't afford to. I can't think offhand of other levels of the decision process at this time, but I think that if one starts playing with projections, one must be aware of this kind of classification scheme that calls for decisions.

PARSONS: Well, we know in this area, at any rate in public high schools, that the proportion who do not take the college preparatory course from the beginning of senior high who ever go to college is very small.

FEIN: We also sometimes act as if the people who are not taking the college preparatory course have made a mistake, and I am suggesting that within their framework, they have acted as they should. This is just something about the framework and about changing it.

HANDLIN: They may not be well informed about the actual odds. I am sure that a Negro in a metropolitan city has less prospect of carrying through with the same social sense and he may not know what the odds are.

MAYER: One of the things that struck my children most at the school boycott in Boston the other day in associating all day with Negro children from Roxbury is how extraordinarily uninformed they were about possibilities in terms of going to college, and the very fact that there were scholarships; they came out with the idea that counseling was atrocious. This is quoting two children, but it was their dominant impression of the day. I think the decision is not felt by our present system, at least in Boston.

HUGHES: I think we're going away a bit here from the economic consideration to the aspiration, a repetition of what we were talking about yesterday. What view, how aware of, and the resource of education and so on, that various kinds of people have and if you build actual labor force data, employment data, and then move over toward the low aspiration notion and when are decisions made and with what effect, and with what perspective and view of the world, we may be getting somewhere, I think.

GRAUBARD: I don't want to cut this short, but toward the end of yesterday, Paul Freund was beginning to make some remarks that I very much wish him to expand on and I have asked him to speak in the way that Mr. Erikson and Mr. Fein have this morning.

HUGHES: May I make a remark to him? I heard on the radio this morning that a judge in Cleveland has given a permanent injunction against demonstrations at certain schools that he cites.

FREUND: Well, all I can do is try to organize very briefly the thoughts that seem to emerge in connection with what a forcibly legal or constitutional analysis might produce. It has been suggested that although there is a good deal in the legal literature about the constitutional development and protection of the Negro and other minority rights, it might be useful to have this made more generally available. But, if so, I think it would be well to focus on the emerging legal constitutional problems, given the basic trends accommodated in these decisions of the last decade.

As I see it, there are two main problems which are related, but which are separable for purposes of analysis. The first has to do with the meaning of the guarantee of equal protection of the laws. The concept that the constitution is color blind was adequate and relevant where the effort was simply to overcome discriminations created by law. The emerging problems are those of forced integration, of racial preferences of one kind or another, of racial subsidies, and quotas. Sometimes the quotas are called benign quotas because they give a preference to Negroes in housing, but these are generally accompanied by a so-called tipping point beyond which no additional Negroes will be admitted, in order to save the property values, at a point which is thought to be the maximum toleration of that mixture. These are very practical issues that are now being litigated in the lower federal courts and which presumably will reach the Supreme Court before too long, and on which, I think, it would be a very practical help to have some more analytical and philosophical discussion. What is the proper meaning of equality? Is it color blindness or will it admit preferences of one kind or another ? Can you distinguish preferences, as Mr. Talcott Parsons suggested, which are by way of subsidy to raise the level of opportunity to equality, from racial quotas; and as was said yesterday, the idea of classification by ethnic groups as distinguished from functional groups like employees or investors or husbands, the idea of classification by ethnic groups is in principle repugnant. The Japanese evacuation is an instance that comes to mind. Should the law, however, make a special adaptation here, and if so, on what grounds that will permit it to be a principle, a decision that will not carry regrettable consequences for the body of the law.

Now the second related question, but separable, I think, has to do with the subjection of Negroes to the ordinary rule of law. It's here that the Cleveland situation, to which reference was just made, would fall. The sit-ins have raised the question and other forms of non-violent protest are, as Ed Levi said yesterday, running an apparent collision course with the main stream of the law. The question is whether this kind of non-violent protest, which is in many instances illegal under positive law, ought to be accommodated within the law or whether it ought to be treated as civil disobedience and its value frankly rested on the moral claim and the moral effect, which civil obedience is entitled to. I mentioned yesterday that the moral claim is strengthened where access to participation has been denied, where there is not adequate representation, either polically or economically, and the law, either the law on the books or the law as it is actually put into practice, doesn't guarantee equality of access. The moral claim is very strong. The question is whether the law should recognize the disobedience as a right or should still regard it only as a form of moral protest, perhaps tempering the punishment while saving the ordinary structure of the law. Well, these are the two main areas of current philosophical, legal discussion. They present dilemmas, they present challenges to the notion of what Herbert Webster calls "neutral principle" of law, and they raise interesting questions of the scope of civil disobedience and its relation to the sanctions of the law.

GEERTZ: I simply want to question on the comment, ask for an extension of your comments. To what degree is it possible to prevent some of these things from rising to the level of law, to make--we were talking about sit- ins--I don't know if there ever was a final decision on certain items of this crisis point, but how far is it possible to keep the courts from having to make a decision about the legality of quotas and civil disobedience, and handling these things by other social control mechanisims than the law, so that we can avoid facing some of the problems in a legal context and face them in not illegal but extralegal context, that is, general context of social control existing beyond and beside the law.

FREUND: Well, the one defect of the law's virtues is that the courts are always open, and you don't have to have a lobby, and there is no Rules Committee in the courts to bottle things up, so that it is rather uncontrolled. Now the judges themselves have a certain control because of the techniques that they have for temporizing, and these have been used with great ingenuity in the sit-in cases thus far, as you know. The court has avoided a straight out decision on the legality of the sit-ins by finding technical lesser grounds on which to uphold the rights of Negroes. In some cases, they were charged with breach of the peace rather than trespass. The Supreme Court said that they couldn't have possibly committed a breach of peace. In other cases, although there was no law on the books that forced segregation, the chief of police has made it clear that that was the policy locally and so the court said well, while in form it's private, it's really publically, governmentally supported. It was a considerable strain, but it allowed the case to be decided on that special ground. Now the case is up this term. It has been held all year. I would frankly hope that the courts could temporize still further, but I am not sure. I'm not sure they can honestly or want to do so. I think they could.

GEERTZ: One of the things that the question suggests is that some of these things that were quoted and so on might be buffered by a new commission, a racial commission, to deal with these problems and so on, to which the law could give standing without giving standing to the principles, that they should support certain modes of dealing with the problems without having to come directly to terms with the. . . is this feasible, possible?

FREUND: Well, to the extent that your statutory law recognizes some of these claims then the heat is off on the bare constitutional writings. I mean, that is why I think the courts would do well to temporize again, because we've got the bill pending in Congress and if we get a public accomodations law, it's an awful lot better, I think, from every point of view than to have the matter come up in the form of an out and out constitutional claim of rights to be served in the restaurants. Better from many points of view--it is more complete, for one thing, there are sanctions for riding, referring to busses, and so on; and furthermore, legislation can be progressive and attemptive and experimental and pragmatic. Constitutional decisions are sporatic and fixed, or if they are not fixed, then they rather downgrade the notion of the constitution, so that I would hope that you could resolve some of these problems short of a constitutional level by statutory rights which may in some instances reinforce the commissions to mediation.

BELL: Your formulation points up an interesting contradiction in terms of the Negro aspirations and claims. In terms of public accomodations on the one hand, they want a situation which doesn't recognize status categories, in fact strikes them down by saying you can't refuse to serve on the basis of a man's color; yet, in the demand for certain preferences, demand is made for help on the basis of the category, so that at the same time they find themselves in a kind of bind so far as what the Negroes ask for.

MAYER: Isn't the problem really one that ideally one would like to have preferences, but not to have them legally recognized? Now, Harvard University abides by the laws of the Commonwealth in not asking for photographs of candidates, being careful not to have any information on religion, national origin, and so on. At the same time, it has a policy of geographic distribution, which means that it is easier to get into Harvard, ability being equal, if you come from Mississippi or a small high school in the west than if you come from a big prep school. Is it not, is there not here an example of what perhaps ought to be done in a preferential treatment which is not publicized as preferential treatment?

FREUND: Well, I think so. As Ed Levi said yesterday, much of this could be done without raising the issue, and this may answer you also, without raising the issue. To start with, that is to say, if you give preferential treatment to lower income groups, you are going t o help the Negroes, or to give preferential treatment to substandard schools, you're going to help the Negro. I think much can be done this way without running head-on into legal principles of individual rather than class qualities.

MERTON: Is it a case that the very concept of preferential treatment, subsidy, is exclusively devoted to the poor? You have the question whether the Negro qua Negro is not being subjected to discriminatory treatment at higher levels in the income structure and the educational structure. We are all aware of the most conspicuous example of that--the Negro college graduate who has been trained in a college where at best he's not apt to be up to the standards required in a graduate school, or if you move down the line a bit, the Negro high school graduate seeking entrance into a first-rate college, and there whether you see lots of Negroes or not, is the need for some sort of interim arrangement to upgrade his competency. On the matter of scale, I suppose there is no question but that what we have been discussing is heavily concentrated in the low income groups among the poor, but I think one of the sources of resistance among Negro leaders I have talked with is the unwillingness to have the identification of the Negro and the poor and to have policies that are centered simply on that sector of the whole hierarchy, that their frequent analogy with the veterans being given preferential treatment is not an analogy with the poor and with public relief, but rather with providing what is needed at every level of the social structure where it is felt that historically and persistently discrimination has occurred and is occurring, and therefore making for unequal aspects. I think going back to Pat's remark yesterday when he first introduced this issue, that if that subject is one of the central themes of the proposed inquiry it might be useful to examine it not only in the most conspicuous case of the poor and the Negro and the correlation between the two, but to see what special problems are involved as you move up the social and economic level.

FEIN: This is particularly important in the light of the fact that half of the Negroes are not poor.

HANDLIN: Here is where the problem really becomes stickiest, because much is being done informally and without the degree of public attention that would reveal a violation of, in some cases, the law. For instance, in college admissions, in the Ivy League colleges, there is actually a recruiting effort to get Negroes in, which does take cognizance of race and does set up differential and preferential standards, and that gets by because it's largely ineffective. The number who are recruited is so small that it doesn't make too much difference. I'm told, for instance, in government employment in Washington that there are differential standards for performance that do give preference to Negroes, and I know of specific cases in which the whole hiring apparatus was set up in such a way as to insure a representation of the Negro. But these measures are largely tolerable because they haven't really affected the more advantageous position of the whites. The problem would arise at the point at which they became effective and did make a difference. At a college, if having a different set of standards for the Negro would actually result in the exclusion of large numbers of whites, there would have to be some kind of justification for it. This issue is arising in New York City in the City colleges, where there are already large numbers of white students who have more than the minimum scores required, but who don't get admitted, and where there is at the same time an effort to lower those scores for the Negro students. Now, on what basis, to speak abstractly, do you go to a white parent and tell him your son ought not to go to college because there are places needed for the son of a disadvantaged Negro? This is a very difficult kind of proposition to frame, because our whole thinking until now has always been on the reverse basis, that the justification for equality of opportunity is that you can discover an objective set of criteria which would be universally applicable and that if you eliminate discrimination on the grounds of race, creed, and previous condition and so on, you can then apply the objective criteria and select the most talented. But if you depart from that, you open up a series of questions which I don't think anyone has really answered.

MERTON: I think you're coming back to the point which turned up repeatedly yesterday, and I rather suspect the transcript will show that this is bound to be one of the main themes in the book, whatever the particular topics under review, and it's the inadvertent consequences of our social system with their differential impacts on different parts of the population. That is, to distinguish between out and out discrimination, and inequality of access to opportunity. Tom Pettigrew just reminded me that in addition to the analogy with the GI Bill that is frequently drawn by Negro leaders today as a precedent for special treatment of selected groups in the population, another favorite analogy is the Marshall Plan and the notion of a domestic Marshall Plan. If one looks at the Marshall Plan, it is preferential treatment, a special subsidy provided to groups that for historical reasons have an acute need of such support. But it seems to me as we discuss these questions here, off the cuff, that we are building a rather strong case for an analysis of this manner of subsidy, preferential treatment, or whatever the appropriate terminology turns out to be, which is pretty much comparable to Professor Freund's treatment of the constitutional and legal questions. That is to say, where it is not a matter of research that is being called for here, but an effort to clarify the moral, political, and other implications of this central issue, and the more the so-to-say pros and cons and the implications of any such family of programs are worked out in publication by the Academy, the more it is apt to be making a distinctive contribution to this general question and, in the end, it does raise a policy question for the publication as to whether some parts of it, under publication, might not best be of this analytical character rather than of a research character. Indeed, it might turn out, when Steve gets around to getting a consensus on the nature of the proposed program, that there might be two correlated types of publications, perhaps occurring at different times; the one essentially being analytical, theoretical, attempting to codify and to analyze some of the pressing issues, the others being based primarily on relatively new research, as well as on the research of the existing literature.

KAYSEN: Oscar has reverted again to a point he raised yesterday and certainly a very important point. I should like to observe the context in which this choice of the equality of opportunity versus positive discrimination with its implication of a corresponding negative discrimination complementary to it arises. This is all-important; questions of context, growth, the scale of the activity. Let's look at the two examples that Oscar reminded us of. The Ivy League is running a recruiting campaign. The number of Negroes in Ivy League colleges is quite small, but a substantial increase in this number would hardly give any particular individual applicant who didn't get in, any particular family, the sense that "I was displaced to make place for a Negro." Look at the situation in City College, by contrast, where it is large enough so that apparently some particular applicants are beginning to have or have already got that sense. And I would think that the most important general proposition one could make is that it is almost impossible, because it's socially intolerable to those on the other side of the equation, to engage in positive discrimination, if you like, in a static context, where it means taking away from someone to give to someone else.

On the other hand, I think it is very easy--at least American economic history anyhow is simply filled with examples of the acceptability of devices which allocate the benefits of growth differential--perhaps to look at the problem in terms of what can be done to make a little extra share of the growth, whether it is growth in income or growth in college places in total, or whatever dimension or activity we are particularly looking at, and see what can be done to provide that a little bit of extra share in the growth go to the disadvantaged group. It seems to me that this takes the edge off the conflict, and posing the issues as conflicts of principal, I don't want to repeat what I said in an apparently philistine way yesterday but posing the issue as conflicts of principle, useful as it is for analytic and reflective purposes, I think often fatal for policy purposes also, and I think we ought, at least to keep this in mind, and to keep in mind the way in which a dynamic makes a softer resolution of the conflict possible. If you take suburbs and suburban housing,

I think there is all the difference in the world between trying to operate on the existing structure, and trying to ask yourself how you can deal marginally with the new suburban developments. We ought to remind ourselves that the total dimension of what we are talking about is such (I mean the total size of the Negro group in the population) that being able to deal marginally in aggregated terms really means being able to take a big and rapid bite at the problem from the measure of the size of the Negro group. And so I don't deny the conflicts of principle, the real conflicts of principle that Oscar is raising. I think that they are here. I agree that they are philosophically important, but I would emphasize that viewed in a proper context of action, it isn't necessary really to resolve the conflict of principle to know what it is that can usefully be different.

GRAUBARD: I think that these last two remarks almost set the stage for the last concerns you really do have to have here; namely, that they seem to me to set very bluntly the question whether if we were to have one volume, would it essentially be a descriptive volume asking mostly for new research on things that we think we need to know and don't presently know? Would it be, on the contrary, such questions as might guide us to policy that needs to be formulated on the Negro question? How much do we want to concern ourselves with a situation that is likely to develop if certain actions are taken or certain things are not done? In this connection, I think constantly of the number of times we have spoken of the possible effect of things that are presently happening and how much this is going to change communities other than the Negro communities. The question really, and it becomes almost a question of how large an inquiry do we make and with what purpose, do we want, in the fashion that Paul Freund suggested, to give some guidance to those who are going to have to make decisions in the next two or three years about some of these things and, therefore, do we orient our volume to meet the needs of that group, or do we, on the contrary, try to point out that there has been little done so far in monographic work, and that this is a lack which really ought, in some part, by the American Academy, to be righted. Or, do we, more particularly, deal really with the large aspects of the society; what sort of American community have we become; what are the resistances? All the points that Mr. Parsons spoke of at the beginning. What are the resistances to the Negro lifting himself; what are the institutional resistances? How much is this a matter of changing certain social structures; how much is it a matter of changing certain ideals? Is this to be our principal concern? And in this connection, one asks immediately, well, what is the urgency with which we work? Should we really aim for some volume, our choice depends obviously on what the volume is, but should we aim for a volume that might be appearing in 1965 or 1966, or, on the contrary, is it a different sort of study that we ought to contemplate? And then, the possibility, of course, which Bob Merton alluded to, maybe really there are two very different things that have been brought up and I do think that the real appreciation of this transcript will only come when it is recorded, and we can see how the various parts have not, in fact, been connected. But, is it possible that we have, in our several comments, been talking about two quite different things that both need doing, but that we ought not to confuse ourselves by putting both in the same place?

Well, what I would like, and I had intended to have a coffee break but it never seemed the time, what I would really like to do if we can, and I think there is some advantage in breaking now, is to get some consensus on what you regard as the most serious matter that might be tackled first were we to do a single volume. That is, what would ideally such a volume cover in terms of themes, what would its purposes be, and maybe, although this is always a dangerous thing to get started on, we might even think of the sorts of persons that we could enlist in our enterprise. I say its dangerous because I think coming up with names around the table is not always the most effective way of doing it. It is much better to do this through correspondence and through talk once we have decided certain things. But I am persuaded of one thing, that this day of talk, yesterday and today, has really suggested precisely what I think all of us instinctively felt when we brought the group together, that this is a sort of theme in which we have got to broaden the number of people who are going to give some time to this study. For all sorts of reasons, the field of race relations in the 1930's was dominated by people coming from certain professional fields. In this connection I have often thought how interesting it would be to study arms control studies as they existed in society in the 1920's and 1950's and '60's. One of the greatest differences, and I don't think it has to do simply with arms technology, has been the extraordinary expansion of the group of people who felt that without losing their own professional affiliation, without ceasing to be one whit less an economist or a political scientist or a psychologist--that suddenly this problem had an importance for them that could make it possible for them to come and sit around this table as they did, and produce the sort of volume that we produced; and I feel that a comparable obligation rests on us this time, and I think if we can, out of the structure of the talk we have already had, produce a plan for a volume that will commend itself, we in fact will be bringing new people into it. I can think of very few things that could be more beneficial in this field and very few things that would really serve the intellectual purposes that we are interested in now. But I do think that there are these really basic questions which still do have to be decided, and I hope that we can spend whatever time this afternoon we can afford in just getting some idea of how all of you feel about the alternatives that exist for us.

HUGHES: I wouldn't want to take the prerogative of the last word, but something was just in my mind that I've thought of since we have been here, and we haven't talked about. And that is the history and problems of the study of race relations, etc. You mentioned who doesn't. Well, Negroes used to have to study. That was the subtlest form of discrimination there was. The Negro had to study race relations if he wanted to be in the social science field. He doesn't have to now, but then there is the whole story of getting money for race relations. The attitude of the foundations toward it, when they will and when they won't, and some of us--there are people who have had what they consider rather bitter experiences on this and the question is--and I think this wouldn't be a bad thing for us to look into--the whole history of the willingness of those who support research of this and other controversial questions.

MAYER: May I point out that I hope at least in many fields we won't make a dichotomized publication between ideas and philosophies on the one hand and facts on the other. I am impressed with the fact that probably the most influential volume written in Britain in the 30's in terms of social policy was a book by John Boyd Orr, which was called Food, Health and Income, where all he did really was to demonstrate that there was a strong correlation not just between mortality and income in the British Isles and mobility and income but even between size and income, and the poor Englishmen were much smaller than rich Englishmen. Well, this fact alone, which was very well documented, really became probably the most important motive force in the tremendous nutrition programs that both the conservative government and the labor government pursued, and to a large extent it was at the root of the national health policy. Now, there are differences which society will not tolerate once they are brought to light. We have talked about college education, which is a touchy and difficult subject, but I have the feeling that, for instance, as far as health is concerned, the fact that (I hope Dr. Schmidt will talk about this this afternoon if there is time), the big differences between mobility, between Negroes and whites, if it was really brought to light, would by itself bring social action without too much discussion as to whether it is a good thing or a bad thing to discriminate in favor of a group which I think all of American society, even arch-segregationists, would think is an undesirable problem to have in our midst.

SCHMIDT: Well, just very briefly, because I don't have a prepared review of what I think is a rather well-documented situation, and I think it is fairly familiar to most of the people here, but I thought it would be interesting to comment simply on a single study of prenatal mortality, that is, prenatal death and neo-natal death by ethnic groups in New York City, which Sam Shapiro published a few years ago. What he has done is to show, among other things, not only that the non-white death rates of babies, shortly before and after birth, are higher than for the white race, but that even when the economic situation is over-come and members of the health insurance plan of New York are prepared, that the non-white rates are still higher than the white rates among the fully insured individuals. In other words, it seems to me that we have two steps in improving the situation. One is as soon as individuals are fully insured in a group plan their rates become lower, but if they are Negroes, their rates are still not as low as the rates of the whites. I don't think that the explanation for this is fully available, but there are a number of aspects that come to mind immediately. One is the long past history of the individual, which can't be overcome just by making services available to him now, and the need to think of this in terms of the next generation coming along, to prepare, through protection of health, better nutrition and all of the environmental and personal circumstances, a more able child-bearing population. Well, another comparison in this is on the occupation level; and the professional, managerial groups among the Negroes still have higher rates than those among the white. I think that this is out of my field, and I suppose this classification based on father's occupation is a pretty poor one and can be very mixed, but I think that is the kind of thing that is worth further observation and further study. Utilization is another aspect of the same problem. In Alameda County, California, a study was made of Papanickoloff smears in relation to cervical cancer. Cervical cancer is much commoner among the Negroes than among the whites. Papanickoloff smears are secured in 9 out of 10 cases on the doctor's recommendation and not on the patient's initiative, and yet the number of Negroes securing these smears, again the non-insured colored people were much fewer than among the whites. Now is this because the doctors didn't recommend it to the Negroes; is it because the Negroes refused to accept it? I don't think we know, but I think these are things that we should look at.

Session IV

GRAUBARD: I want to say that it would help enormously if having had these several sessions, now we could somehow conclude with a set of, perhaps, injunctions, or a set of recommendations about what might be avoided and what most particularly should be attempted. As I tried to put it this morning, it is a question really of what needs doing first, because there is no reason to believe that we cannot do several things in this field, but what needs doing first and what order of priority are we going to give and what time table are we going to use. Given the sorts of things we have talked about in these last two days, are there some things which, if published within a year or two, might make a sufficient difference so that there is an obligation upon us to move rapidly. And this is really what I would be very grateful for your thoughts on.

PARSONS: Mr. Chairman, I personally would feel an extremely strong case for moving rapidly because of the situation which you outlined yesterday in your opening remarks, and reinforced by others that there has been no comprehensive statement in this problem area since Myrdal by anyone. And it has become such a salient national issue in so many different ways that I think a tremendous service is to be gained by bringing together and emphasizing its many facets and its tremendous intensity and in a way that, on the one hand, mobilizes what scholarly resources are available, but on the other hand reaches a broader public than other studies. But I would suggest the advisability of not much more than a year's deadline; that is my personal feeling.

GRAUBARD: Well, what would that involve in terms of the things that we couldn't do? That is, are there certain sorts of monographic or research efforts that couldn't be made if we were going to aim for publication in a year? Does that matter really? Is it of great importance that that type of work go on first? I have the feeling that once we get to the transcript and see all the suggestions that have been made, suggestions for so many things that could be done without extensive private research that we could get a very important volume together in something like a year or two. I wonder, Tom, how do you feel about it?

PETTIGREW: I would agree with Talcott's point about the timing. Two problems: one, information is definitely needed, not only of a factual nature, emphasized by some, but also some of the philosophical, moral aspects. I don't see these as really separate; in fact, I don't see how you can really have one without the other to some extent. And another thing, if you plan a 3 or 4 year project, I think things will change so fast that four years from now what you did this year might be outdated by the time you go to press, so that's another argument for having a relatively short deadline and using material that is readily available rather than trying to do fundamental research within the Academy itself.

GRAUBARD: Would that be the general feeling around the table? All right, then let me, if I may, move to the other matter and that is: given the sorts of things that were opened as possibilities, are there some, for example, the point you made yesterday, Mr. Geertz, about the family structure of the Negro in America. Now this is the sort of thing that could on one level be an effort that quite clearly would take many years. On the other hand, it really touches all the other moral, philosophical questions that we treated. Now, how could we introduce that theme into our study so that it did have a place and yet was not simply impressionistic?

GEERTZ: I don't know the literature very well, but I think there is a good deal of material on the Negro family literature and there are people who are working in this area, and I would have to stop to think about names--Pettigrew would know some others. There are people who are concerned about this problem, and there has been more and more turning to the study of kinship in urban society. There have been a lot of rather useful studies of what happens to the family, especially of those people who are urbanizing, and in somewhat similar situations in the Caribbean and in Africa and so on. I think finding the right person to write the article, which is going to be the variable in all these things is important. There is enough material both on the Negro family in American and comparative material to make a fairly good summary statement. There is more analytic material about the nature of materialism and organized discussion about it, so that something really could be synthesized out of what there is which would give us an image at least of what the sort of problems would be that are critical. This, I think, would be something that doesn't exist, I mean, hasn't been ordered in these terms. Now who should do it, that's another question.

PETTIGREW: Can I add a footnote to that, bringing in the father-absence psychological factors which tie directly into it?

MOYNIHAN: The question of employment in this whole context seems to me very fundamental to public policy.

SCHMIDT: With emphasis, I would take it, on the public policy aspect rather than on the minutiae of speculations on opportunities that Mayer raised for the next twenty years.

PARSONS: There is a complex of empirical subject matter, family, kinship, employment situations, psychological considerations, and somebody could take the empirical material of a whole complex and draw certain conclusions for a policy, not from any one of these but from the combination.

ERIKSON: Could I try to formulate something here which I don't understand myself? Now, you referred to Myrdal. That's one man who collected a number of data and then indicated something with his personal ability to indicate it, writing one book.

HUGHES: Excuse me, there were a number of books. It wasn't his only one--there were books on the Negro and the labor force, consumption, a great many books. People only speak of that one book.

ERIKSON: Now, you mean at that period, but he was the integrator. So the question is now, if you bring out an issue of a book, how would it be integrated, because otherwise you get one piece on the economic aspects, one on the political, one on the legal and one on the psychological. Well, it's obvious this has been around. Certainly I, for example, haven't been asked and I haven't said I would, but if I were to try to write something on identity, I certainly couldn't take it out of the other contexts that you have expressed. So the question is whether this could be more of a symposium in this sense than most volumes of this kind. Ideally, everybody should have time enough to read everybody else's and to react to them early enough to put in his own paper references to the others. I don't know exactly how one would do this, but---why do you smile?

GEERTZ: I was thinking that, if you want to do this in a year, you will have to figure out some way to inhibit the social scientist's natural desire to be absolutely impregnable, and therefore to realize that it is not necessary for these to be definitive papers and he doesn't have to have read everything that has ever been written on the Negro family to write a paper on the Negro family. Not that this work should be shoddy, but just that it is fundamental.

HUGHES: I think there may be a formula for that. Suppose we're thinking of the labor force, and suppose somebody, one of those tough economists down there, would be pointing out the basic changes in the labor force as well as what is known about the Negro and the labor force, but you would be indicating it within the framework of what happened to the labor force in general, and then they could outline some things that we jolly well better be finding out. It seems to me that all these papers raise the problem of identity, illustrate some things that are known, but here are things that we had better understand, what goes on in the mind of a Negro, about whether he wants to have. . . I think of a story of a man going from Chicago down to Georgia on a train, and there is a southern man there saying how the Negroes don't want to go to school with whites, and he called the waiter and said, "Now look, George, you don't want your son to go to school with my son," and he said, "Boss, I sure don't." To point out the basic problem, the sources of possible ambivalence, some data, these are the things we ought to get busy finding out. For not only have we not got a general survey of race relations, but we haven't got any prospectus, which could combine ideas, frames of reference, what facts we haven't had yet.

GRAUBARD: Yes, I almost feel the second is the primary object. That is, if we could simply indicate the sorts of things that we don't know and need to know if we are going to be able to operate in certain atmospheres. That is, I do think you brought this up yesterday, Dan, there really was implicit in the Myrdal volume the notion that all was working itself out. It would be a matter of time. One of the things that constantly recurred yesterday is how, in the process of not working itself out over the last years, you create new problems in the society generally, and if this could be stated in various ways.

FEIN: A cautionary note--I don't want to sound like Carl yesterday, a cautionary note on tone, but I am just awfully worried about tone here. What does this sound like? We can't do certain things till we get some more research; we just want to be careful not to make it sound too much like a prospectus for research, with action waiting upon the results. Just tone.

MAYER: Isn't there a question also which we haven't really talked about too much--the national versus local and regional aspects? I am sure that social scientists consider the situation as extraordinarily different in New York City from what it is in a small town in Mississippi, and there is the balance between the new and general problems and the older ones to think about. It seems to me that one of the major things that has happened since Myrdal is that the Negro has become urbanized to such an extent that if things go on the way they do, the big cities of America will be largely Negro cities. We haven't talked at all about the impact of urban renewal and all its implications, but it seems to me that we should put a particular emphasis on the problem of urban situations, because this is what's particularly new and what's perhaps particularly important at the moment.

FREUND: Just a practical suggestion to avoid the dilemma of having everyone write after having seen everybody else's paper. It might be a good idea if each contributor had at least the names and titles of the others, and if he felt it desirable to be in touch with certain other people, to find out, at any rate, the course of their thinking or perhaps their basic statistical or empirical data, because I thoroughly agree that it's especially important in this sort of thing, where policy considerations are urgent, that the articles which are oriented in that direction have the benefit of the best empirical data that the others are going to present.

GRAUBARD: I think this could be quite easily accomplished. That is, if the transcript, as I think it will, can suggest a scheme, and if on that basis we can work out a division of labor and achieve a coherence between, let us say, 12 or 15 topics or themes, we could then invite the people and each invitee would know who else was being asked and to do what. In fact, as with all our efforts, we usually begin every letter asking a person to write by giving a fairly complete description of what the whole project is to be, and then very specifically of what his place in the project is, and I think that this suggestion that we also include the names of the others would be very helpful.

Incidentally, it might interest you to know, in connection with the Arms Control volume, that I found among the mail yesterday a letter from Ormsby Gore about the arms control volume and what it did and then talking about the New Europe volume, and I was struck that he talks about this as the thing-- What I would like to see is if we make a short enough deadline where there would be some incentive for an author to do his paper quickly and then to distribute it to the others so that he could have the benefit of their comments, and then we could come together in another conference of this sort. As with all such conferences, this is the planning committee. The conference hopefully would be a larger group. That is, ourselves, hopefully several of the authors will be from among us, but there will be others, and then a group of people who are not either authors or members of the planning committee, but who are persons to be asked. I think the whole thing could, if there were reason, be done perhaps within a year or within a year and a half. But I think there is the necessity that people should feel, and again this depends on whom we select and how much urgency they themselves are willing to communicate to the others, that getting the paper in on time and really doing it and giving it priority over what inevitably will be other obligations, is necessary. This is really--the arms control story in a sense--a very interesting one, because we did on that occasion give essentially three months to people who were already very busy.

BELL: May I just pose one slight problem in terms of time perspective and orientation. A year from now presumably the Civil Rights Bill will have been passed; there will at least have been some resolution of it. Presumably the poverty program will have gotten under way either in some attenuated form or some large form, so that it seems to me that the perspective one wants to adopt really is apt to jump ahead a bit in terms of the suggestion that Professor Freund used yesterday, ". . . beyond civility," so to speak. The more difficult problems will come when the initial normative goals are reinstituted in the sense that the Supreme Court gave a moral basis ten years ago. Now there is a legislative sanction, which is again a new normative consideration, and now you get the real intra-struggle on local levels as in New York now, where the pressure is back and forth on the education areas. We may be perhaps still looking at the higher levels which may be less relevant a year from now. The problems that will come up a year from now will be much more detailed than perhaps the framework we have now.

GRAUBARD: Well, how can that. . .

BELL: In terms of the framework that Talcott outlined yesterday, which I think is a very useful framework. . . a great social map. . . I think much of the discussion has been put on the symbolical or normative level, whereas I suspect a year from now many more of the problems will be on the intra-school problem interest level really. . . where you will probably again be facing implementation and be dealing with resistances back and forth. Now I may be wrong, but at least in terms of trying to adopt a time perspective as of a year from now, that may be happening. Now you may want, in effect, to take this into account. . . in terms of planning; you may not want to be that topical and simply be caught up in that kind of projection, but then to say, well, let us look at it in terms of a larger social map, realizing that people are at that particular point.

GRAUBARD: But I thought in the conversation yesterday, both Talcott Parsons and Everett Hughes pointed out the institutional resistances to integration and pointed out how really difficult they are, and how important it is that we should understand them. I cannot believe that that sort of thing would be very much changed in one year.

PARSONS: It would be more visible and more the focus of the actual conflict than now.

GRAUBARD: Well, then, what has really to be done is to concern ourselves with that sort of thing rather than with the very special problems that preoccupy us in a political sense today.

BELL: Yes, plus the one dimension we haven't had really represented which is some picture of the political bargaining which will be going on, not so much anymore on the national level--there are all sorts of others ways--not so much in the formal sense of Congress, but the bargaining that goes on in terms of the kinds of things the Negroes want, and this process is still one which is unfolding and one which has not really been looked at. Jim Wilson has a book on it and to some extent there are other studies of this kind. By and large the kind of process in political bargaining, the organization in the legal community for political bargaining, to the extent that this would gell, seems to me an important dimension if one looks ahead now.

HUGHES: One of the things that I think is very important to get before American scholars and the American public is the point at which we apparently stand, this dialectic between rights of the individual and rights of the group. I don't think that has really full force yet and I think that our friend Professor Freund, together with some people who have studied movements of this kind before, here or in other countries, if they could make this clear and point out some of the implications, could make this a very important thing, as well as the identity thing. I think the place, the mode, of seeing our labor force and our evolving prospectus, and getting the idea that the structure of the labor force is changing. You can present that pretty fast. I mean, some of the changes in the labor force can be pointed out and the effect of that on the whole problem of economic and occupational integration. That could certainly be pointed out.

PARSONS: I certainly--I'd like to make two points. First, I wouldn't be in the least worried about presenting materials that are well known to the experts, but that are not well known to the broader public to whom you want to appeal, and are not generally seen in this particular context and their significant form. So I think thoroughly competent summaries of the available evidence in the topical area, slanted to its significance for this problem, would be one extremely important type. The other point is that my own feeling is strongly in favor of attempting to describe a balance of relative comprehensives. I quite agree with what Dan Bell said about the emerging salients of certain phases of the problem, but I don't think that that should be emphasized to the neglect of other things that are essential to the background of understanding why this has become so salient. Now if you have the scope of the Arms Control volume, or the Europe volume, you can get quite a lot in.

HUGHES: There is the basic change in our society that I think could be pointed out--it is known to the experts--and that is changes in the distribution of goods and services. We have two gentlemen here who have given us some inklings of how intricate is the whole problem of distributing medical services. Now, it isn't just how far it is to the nearest doctor or whether you can or he will charge you one dollar or nothing and somebody else ten dollars to make up for it. This whole medical distribution system has become infinitely more intricate than it ever was, and look at insurance in medicine; and it seems to me that some of the changes in the distribution of goods and services in our society might lead and does lead to differences in availability of certain kinds of goods and services to different elements of the population, specifically the Negro. This, it seems to me, is a very crucial picture here. I don't know whether there is anyone who has worked on consumption in that comprehensive way, including legal services, medical services; maybe you would want to take education as a special one, housing, food, whatever it is. I think the Negro as consumer and the distribution system should be dealt with in a pretty comprehensive way and the perspective could be given even though we couldn't fill in all the details.

GEERTZ: I want to speak to a question which I think is very important which Dr. Erikson raised about integration and other people have raised. It seems to me that as this book is a somewhat different kind of book from others, or professes to be, and it could easily be a non-book, it is much more important than most such symposia. There might well be a general essay written afterward by someone who is in charge or who tries to say what it all means, what the rationale of it is, why it was done this way, someone who tries to sum up some of the ideas that have occurred in this discussion and will recur in others, which is concerned not so much with the Negro problem, but with the book. I mean, not just methodological reflections, I don't mean that, but some fairly reasonably lengthy essay saying what this book is for, what we are trying to say to each other, what we are trying to do, and also, as a footnote, I would drop very quickly the American dilemma of Myrdal's image, because that is exactly what the book is not supposed to be like, and we ought to try another metaphor of some sort for what kind of book it is like. But if it doesn't, I agree that if it is just a series of snap-shot pictures of the distribution of goods and services, of the labor force, of identity and so forth, it could seem like a scrapbook, and it isn't. In fact, of course, the problem holds it together, but someone must take responsibility for showing what the logic of this particular publication is; it is not just that we are restless about the Negro problem and feel we ought to do something, and this is what we did and it didn't come out very well. You know, really try to say what it is. . .

GRAUBARD: Erik says that you said what he meant. Of course, what the guest editor of almost all of these volumes does, and I think the point you make is that particularly here it has to be done afterwards, and must reflect why certain things have been included--that's why it's important really to decide in some very general way about the things that you're hoping to achieve with the volume. There are many aspects of the problem which were just excluded on the basis of their not being relevant to the principal theme you have selected.

MAYER: Well, without being as optimistic as Gunnar Myrdal, then it seems to me that what we are still doing is to say that it is an American problem, that we think it could be solved in at least a number of ways, and what particular areas are we going to look at in terms of presenting what the difficulties are. When we do that, we at least give the ground work for solutions. If we decided to look into the medical care and the Negro, education and the Negro, and so on, this is hopefully because we think that somehow these can be brought up to the standard level that is acceptable to American society. We are still, it seems to me, in the context of activism and we still have to pick the areas in terms of what we think can be done about them within a short while.

GRAUBARD: Do you say that critically, in the sense that that should not be or. .?

MAYER: No, I think that is the only way to proceed, by which the thing is manageable, rather than an encyclopedia of all the things that could be said.

BELL: I think it would be an interesting little social experiment for us to try this. I have the feeling that perhaps many of us have the attitude that much of this is being done from a good point of view, so to speak, the societal point of view, how we get things done, how do we solve this. If half the transcript were sent to people like Martin Luther King or Ken Clark, or Whitney Young and let them react to it, I think it may be very interesting to see what kind of viewpoints you might get, as they see the problem, based upon the flow of ideas which have come here. And then, perhaps, they can extract some of the answers.

GRAUBARD: Well, if as is very likely, out of this transcript we do come up with a summary of several pages which we think we are satisfied with, this might be a very useful thing to distribute.

ERIKSON: That, of course, brings us back to the question: are we now, is this group now segregated by default or is the larger group which you have in mind going to include the gentlemen mentioned here plus some others, and will there be a special forum, maybe, that would be the big meeting where they could react?

GRAUBARD: I know that both Whitney Young and John Hope Franklin--Franklin did indicate that he might still be in India, but both of those responded as if they wanted to be here--wanted to be here but they couldn't make this meeting although they still want to be part of the planning group. Allison Davis was supposed to be here, so I can't know what his feelings are.

HUGHES: Well, Mr. Young probably had a special duty because there is a quote on a page in the Times that announced yesterday a new program.

GRAUBARD: That is right. He told me that something was coming up about a month ago that made it impossible to be here. But I intend to inform anyone who wasn't here, especially the three Negroes whom we asked to the meeting, of course, that I intend to keep them informed.

HUGHES: Franklin Edwards of Howard University probably knows more about the occupational composition of the Negro middle class in this country than anyone. As a matter of fact, I think he's making a speech about it at the Eastern Sociological Society at the Statler Hilton this afternoon.

PETTIGREW: He also, I would say, is the leading authority on the Negro family.

SCHMIDT: I wonder if there would be any merit, in order to avoid any appearance of the book's being too highly academic and ivory towerish, in having someone like the Commissioner of Public Welfare of New York City involved in some way, if only as a person to react. Mr. Dumpson, being a Negro, is, I think, the first Negro to head a hugh public welfare department, and an extraordinarily imaginative person, who is bringing new methods, at least in so far as I know, to the health aspects related to welfare in terms of the population of New York City, not only Negroes, of course.

GRAUBARD: Are there any other injections in terms of the sorts of people who ought to be involved? In this connection, Mr. Moynihan, I am very curious from the point of view of your position in the Government what, out of these two days of talk, would seem to be the things that would be the most useful if they could be pursued by this group and by publication.

MOYNIHAN: There are three things which I have in mind, and one is Dr. Freund's discussion of what are the elements that have to go into a public policy decision on preferential treatment; what are all the things that you have to study in a systematic way; secondly, I felt that the things that Dr. Erikson talked about seem to me fundamental. If anyone is going to try to devise a strategy of reconciliation, it is perfectly possible that out of a theoretical understanding of how a group comes to accept each other you could devise some thought. I mean, how are southern whites and southern Negroes going to learn to live with each other and the Northerners--to accept the larger inclusiveness; and certainly I think that the problem of the Negro family is practically the property of American government. I mean, we spend most of our money on this, in one form or another, in health, in welfare, and on employment, and yet we know nothing about it or not much about it, and one of the reasons is that we are not supposed to know anything about it; it's none of your business that 40% of the kids are illegitimate and don't, for heaven's sake, try to get it published, you can't. And if it is getting worse, that's even less of your business. All you're supposed to do is to keep on supplying welfare, and if we knew something about the dynamics of that and if we could, for heaven's sake, find something besides the inheritance from slavery, which sort of leaves you there--that's it, that's it--but if there is something that is new, if it's getting worse because of reasons that are new, then there is a possibility of public policy reacting to it.

GRAUBARD: I thought the family issue is really one of the absolutely essential ones. You know, the other one, of course, this whole concept that you developed yesterday, Talcott, of subsidy and what is a subsidy, and particularly your image of infant industries, was very suggestive to me. I have never heard it, and really it is again the question of how can you devise a formula where you help and don't appear to be helping for the wrong reasons, and, in fact, help in ways which achieve the end you are particularly looking for. And it really does relate again to your thought, Erik, of how do you define this group, how do you change from a negative to a positive identity.

HUGHES: That's also related to this whole question.

PARSONS: It's not altogether fantastic to draw an analogy between the situation of the disadvantaged group like this and illness, and to draw a parallel with respect to the justification of health. There is a sense in which the Negro is the sick group in our society, who needs help, and in the interests of the society as a whole, not only in their own--

BELL: But I think, isn't there a problem--this is from their point of view. You know, it's not only a matter of tactics and identity, but even more a matter of history. What is striking, perhaps, and very strongly so, is that while we all accept the idea of America as a democracy, the whole history of American democracy, the increasing amount of concern, let's say among Negro writers, with the fact that this is a racist democracy, it's hypocritical, it's false. All the pretensions, in a sense, of the society never really apply to Negroes, so that from their point of view, it is not a matter obviously of illness. I mean it's one way of conceptualizing it from an over-all social point of view, but from their point of view, it's a matter of rights, and rights and illness is a very different kind of orientation obviously.

ERIKSON: That some doctors exist who correspond to the illness in their training .

PARSONS: I was thinking in terms of the need for help and of being in a position, a sub-standard, incapacitated position, which can't be blamed on them.

BELL: What is striking sometimes is the extreme dimensions of Negro orientations that you get in any protest movement. About a year and a half ago, I think, Nkrumah made a speech in which he said something to the effect that a large part of American wealth had been built upon the backs of Negro slaves. Therefore, the U. S. ought to indemnify Ghana, since most of the slaves came from Ghana, and this is part of an age old problem. This is exactly your idea of rights. You see, no one who governed had the courage to say, "Well, who sold the slaves to slavery, if not your own tribal chiefs?" And I suspect that some of this may come up in the next 20 years. You get a lot of these societies getting into all kinds of crises, as you look for enemies, so to speak. Bobby Kennedy, I think, when he went to Indonesia, was it? was told about the Mexican War of 1848, in which they said, "Why did you take Texas after all? Isn't this something you have to restore to Mexico?" and so many things which you think are long deep past in American history suddenly come up. This is the return of the repressed in the most extraordinary way. And I suspect that this instance of Nkrumah, given its infra-sense, is not going to be untypical in the next ten or twenty years. Particularly the fact that the pace of change is not going to be satisfactory to them.

HUGHES: It might appeal to Mr. Mirk who wrote the book on the concept of manifest destiny, and he has some very interesting chapters in there on who was included in this. You didn't include Negroes in this manifest destiny. It always seems a little wrong. The Canadians didn't join because, after all, they were white and protestant and they got a little frightened when they got beyond Texas down to Mexico, and they weren't sure that it was our manifest destiny to carry democracy down there to those Catholic, dark-skinned people. But there is a very good discussion in Mirk on this whole question of who is included in the American moral democractic community, and the Negroes on a whole haven't been included.

MOYNIHAN: I believe what Mirk said. Eli Ginsberg is producing a book right now which states precisely the proposition that Myrdal may have thought that the Negro situation would solve itself because it really conflicts with basic American convictions. Ginsberg takes a different position of "No, it doesn't, it hasn't, it may half do so now," but the American democracy has been a white democracy up until our time, and I think it is perfectly true what Senator Kennedy said the other day, that President Kennedy was the first American President to declare, to state publicly that segregation is morally wrong. He was not only the first one to state it, but I suspect that he may have been the first one to believe it. Teddy O'Donnell told me one day that after a visit of President Truman's to the White House, the President came out shaking his head, President Kennedy, that is, saying, "I just can't get used to his talking about the 'niggers.'"

GRAUBARD: I was struck by your story this morning, Mr. Hughes, about the southern state, the novel, which I didn't know--the southern state without Negroes--Oh, I am sorry, Bob Merton, it makes you think again of how much we do live with sort of,well, how much we forget that some of the figures whom we are so admiring of, like Harry Truman really come so close to a sort of society that isn't at all extinct and that does feel this way, and while he may be for any number of other things, when it comes to this issue, obviously his other feelings prevail.

PARSONS: He integrated the armed forces.

PETTIGREW: I think the Ginsberg thesis can be far overdone and that the reaction to Myrdal's is now becoming kind of popular and is, I think, going too far. There was more to Myrdal's argument than we are willing to grant now. In fact, even slave holders in the south, all through the early part of the 19th century, were guilty as all hell about slavery, and they developed all sorts of elaborate and torturous rationalizations. There are a lot of things I think Ginsberg just cuts right over, doesn't give proper attention.

HUGHES: Well, that is Mirt's point too, it took a long time to rationalize this.

KAYSEN: Talcott Parsons' very old point, that once you start on this set of categories, it's very hard to stop. You can't equal except treated according to capacity except that universalizing categories are universalized.

HUGHES: Mr. Graubard, may I inquire what is to be done with the transcript?

GRAUBARD: That depends, hopefully. As you know, a transcript never reads as well as the discussion. It's going to be an edited version and certainly, I think, if at all possible, we would like to distribute it. If we don't distribute it, we will certainly make a very full precis of it. And that will be distributed. And as I say, I am sure that this transcript is going to be very carefully studied, because I really do think that probably in the transcript itself are embedded the ideas that ought to dominate any book that comes out, and I think that it will have to be studied from that point of view. As I mentioned this morning, the thing that is always dangerous to try to do around the table is to think of names of people who should be involved in a project, and yet there is some advantage in doing so. I wonder if I could impose on you to the extent of your just giving me some notion of some of the people, and again, remembering that our object here is not simply to choose people who have already written extensively on the topic of the Negro, but rather, just as this group itself represents people who have and people who have not, to think of persons who ought to be enlisted in this effort and who, by being enlisted, might make it a very different thing from what it would otherwise be. I wonder, as I say, this is always dangerous to ask, because it is generally very hard for people to think so quickly, but I wonder if there were certain persons who immediately come to mind--they might be individuals or types of people who would consider us very remiss if we didn't include them.

BELL: I can think of two at the moment. Monroe Berger has been doing a rather detailed study of the Black Muslims in which he goes back to his old doctoral dissertation. He has a long history of relationship on this. It might be interesting to some extent, I don't know. This is just random thought. Robert McKeever, who many years ago was involved in the problems of aesthetic discrimination, the nature of this in relation to political process, too. Maybe he would be interested in doing something like this.

PETTIGREW: I think, on the institutional barriers, and this aspect we talked so much about yesterday, that again he was heavily involved in race work in the 50's and sort of dropped out of it, now I think he's coming back in--Robin Williams at Cornell. It's not really on institutional barriers as such; it's more research but I think. .

GEERTZ: Another person who has been involved in a very practical way, having just written and gotten accepted the major plan for the reorganization of the school system in Chicago is Phil Hauser.

HUGHES: Phil Hauser and Robert Hankirst put together that report.

PARSONS: I have already mentioned, Steve, this young man at the University of Michigan, Leon Mayhew, who has done an exceedingly interesting study of the problem of implementation of anti-discrimination legislation that bears very much on the institutional barriers. That is to be published as a book.

PETTIGREW: And to help out with Hauser, and who used to work with Karl Tauber now at Berkeley, son of the senator from Wichita. . . At any rate, wherever he is, he's the man who did the Puerto Rican study in Chicago (Carl is referring to) and did his thesis, and his wife updated his thesis on residential patterns.

PARSONS: If Dan Price is doing the SSRC Census volume, census monography volume on the Negro, he would be just full of information.

FEIN: Well, he's doing the Negro one, and then there is one going on on the family, and with a good deal of attention on the Negro family with some overlap with Dan's, and then there's one on education and again more attention to education of the Negroes than Dan is going to be giving to education of the Negro in his Negro volume. These things all start hitting together, but the family one ought to be done this summer. Price told me the other day that he hopes to be done by July 1, but he might miss it. The education one ought to be done by the fall or end of the summer, and these people who are working on those volumes are in touch, trying to eliminate as much duplication as they can. So that if one hits one of them, like Dan, one ought to be able not only to milk Dan, if he is interested, but also to find where the gaps in his information are, but gaps which are filled in the other volumes.

PETTIGREW: Also Carolina, and related to Price's project, in the political science department is Donald Mathews and Prothro on the Negro vote, primarily in the south. They have done demographic work, but they have also done field work directly. But how about the name of an economist who can do what we talked so much about yesterday, and it seemed to me that at least one of the most critical things that came out of our discussions is the projections, alternative strategies, given alternative growth rates, etc.

KAYSEN: Rashi Fein!

FEIN: By the way, Price is not at Carolina now, he's at the Behavioral Sciences at Stanford for the year.

GRAUBARD: This is a real problem, Carl, as you know, and I think Tom has said. . . Oh, well, he will certainly be one of them, I hope, but as Tom Pettigrew said to me once, in New York I think, the extent to which this field has not attracted economists is overwhelming.

FEIN: Well, Carl knows the names of economists who, on particular topics, might get interested.

KAYSEN: I really think what we are talking about here is a synthetic job, not a monographic. And actually, I would go so far as to speculate aloud, and this is a dangerous thing to do, that not only might we persuade our friend here to devote a little of his effort to this but that his institutional masters, the Brookings Institute, might conceivably be willing to help find, you know, create a locus where one or two other people, either people not now there or people who were there. For instance, the best name I could think of, in addition to Rashi Fein, would be Robert Lautman at the University of Wisconsin, who's the man who, sort of professing the communist point of view, invented poverty in recent years. It was his monograph for the Joint Committee study on inflation and price levels five years ago that really focused attention on the proposition that the income distribution was moving away from the equalization that had characterized this movement for perhaps two decades before, and first put together the quite shocking figures on what proportion of families are poor by varying standards, and he's very good. Then I think that what is really needed is to take off, as we borrow from the very large set of ongoing enterpri ses that are producing general models of U. S. economic growth--there is one in every back yard, or at least every back yard in which a million dollars worth of research money is to be found--and draw from these some of the kind of inputs needed for our more specialized concern. What's Ed Denison doing?

FEIN: Rates of growth in Western Europe.

GRAUBARD: One problem, of course, is the whole field of education. Yesterday--again, we will find this in the transcript--but the problem particularly dealing not with years of schooling but quality of education; and it was perfectly clear that that was a harder thing to get at and probably the more telling fact if we could get at it, and I just wondered if Frank Keppel,now at the Office of Education, would be able to initiate? Is research going on there or is there anything in the government that would be helpful, or what could we do in that general area?

HUGHES: I sat on the Advisory Committee of the Cooperative Research Grants at the Office of Education for a number of years, and I must say that the professional educators and administrators on that Board were very resistant to having the government ever look behind the phenomenon of accreditation; if it was accredited, it was good. In fact, they have been able to break through that, as well as anybody could, but you would very likely have to get outside the accrediting, the professional secondary school people, to get the kind of cutting through that you would want.

BELL: Probably there are some resources in the Ford Foundation on this, since they have to know where they have given the money and where the gaps come.

HUGHES: Ford, I believe, has just given a considerable sum of money to Harold Hunt at Harvard to study this whole question of school desegregation; is this not true? (Yes). And he was in charge of the Chicago School System when there was the first big push on this right after the war.

FEIN: There is some work on this, I think, going on under Ted Schultz at the University of Chicago--on quality of schooling--but the focus of interest of one of the doctoral dissertations being produced there--that's only last week--was the Negro.

PETTIGREW: Who is the testing man at Chicago--Blum? (yes)

GRAUBARD: Talcott Parsons has just suggested that we might also approach James Conant or one of those who worked with him on the New York situation.

PETTIGREW: The only thing wrong with that is that if there is a major weakness in the Conant study, it is certainly involved in the Negro and it is almost a blind spot in their study--they either ignore it or the kind of things they say are strictly out of the 19th century, and just the mention of Conant's name or the research sends Negro leaders into an absolute tailspin, and I don't blame them. They have excellent evidence on which they base their criticism.

GRAUBARD: I would say that puts about three questions. Is there someone who didn't present his seniority report for that? Tom is one of the group who fought his recommendations but might be asked--anyone in his group that might be asked?

PETTIGREW: It was not apparent. He made a pretty clear shot.

FEIN: Can I ask, without trying to divert this from names, a specific question in terms of coverage? Is it envisioned,even beyond the kind of thing that Dan Price could contribute out of the '60 census, that there would be a piece that tried to bring together a lot of empirical data now available about the Negro, but available in diverse sources, either sources about the Negro, but they are sort of scattered, or unavailable because the publication wasn't really about the Negro, but may happen to be a goldmine of information? I can think of the Morgan, David, Brazer, Cone book. But there are undoubtedly all kinds of bits of information. When one tries to work with them, they are hard to come by. I don't know whether one would want to have a piece that tried to pull together and made available in one place simple references, things we want to know.

HUGHES: Howard University has been talking about getting a clearing house of this kind, but I don't know whether they have done anything about it or whether it has just begun. Whoever has got this is beyond collecting obvious titles.

KAYSEN: I was thinking about a synthetic effort of taking the information, take the most important parts of it, organize it in some respectable framework. I would think, Steve, that if you could find the right couple of people, and I would suspect it would best be done by two or three people, you know, with different professional minds and specialization, who were deep enough into this so that it wouldn't be a large diversion of their efforts to do it. This, itself, put out perhaps--I was making some notes from the same kind of thing here. I would think of something that might be 50 to 75 pages long, that might have an appendix which says what we don't know that we really ought to know after it has said what we do know. This itself, put out separately, perhaps could be done in under a year and would be very, very useful.

FEIN: This would be a major contribution. I cite two small pieces of evidence, one the fact that I was approached to try and do something like this by people in the sort of journalistic area, who felt a real need for it, and from my own experience on the staff of the Council of Economic Advisors in Washington--every time something came up on the Negro, I had to either call the Labor Department or call Health, Education and Welfare, the Public Health Services. I could never pick up a book and look up the most obvious of things. The mortality tables are in the Public Health Services; the education tables are in the Office of Education; and the unemployment figures are in the Department of Labor. This is the messy part of it. It would be very useful, and some of the things are very surprising figures. Maybe brought together that way, more attention would be paid some of them.

KAYSEN: It seems to me that the very act of assembling this, if done by the kind of people whom you want to do it and who want to do it, would produce some thought, so that the natural by-product would be to say something about it, as well as to say here it is. That combination I would think a very valuable contribution.

PETTIGREW: Particularly if you could stimulate bringing people into the race area who haven't been specializing in it before.

KAYSEN: That may be inconsistent with doing it with dispatch.

GRAUBARD: But there is, of course, I think of an article like John Whiting's piece on parental deprival. This, on the surface, is not about the Negro, but actually the community he is most talking about and this,as you know, the locating of this sort of data, of finding what article without its having the Negro in its title or even a suggestion that it is about a Negro, is, in fact, specifically about that. It is very, very difficult, but is well worth it.

PETTIGREW: Some of the hottest data on the Negro, people who are afraid really to publish right under the title of Negro, is purposely sneeked in to studies--I think of some homicide data which shows tremendous discrimination in sentencing, and so forth, in Philadelphia. It's in a book on homicide by Wolfgang and he even describes a table as showing no discrimination when any fool can look at the table and see, and he knew this, but he had the cooperation of the police and so he couldn't--he figures the police couldn't read the tables--but everybody else could. And he was right. The most valuable thing was involved--purposely.

FEIN: Well, that's one level. These are sort of analytical data that arise out of analytical studies, and then there is another level and both are important data, just survey data, census data, all kinds of data, but that are buried in little reports and never pulled together, and are surprising and remind us of the point that I tried to emphasize yesterday--that there are many Negro communities.

GRAUBARD: I think this might very well be done separately, and would be rather like the critical bibliography that we hope to publish separately and that would again include both materials that were specifically on the Negro and also, insofar as we are able to, those that do not bear that designation but are clearly about that. I think this is a very good suggestion.

ERIKSON: Well, I wanted to suggest something really different, and again I just want to suggest it for discussion. Afterall, this whole integration movement now begins to have a history already. Could somebody who was involved in it, let's say, on the side of the Negroes--I thought of Rusin, but you say he's probably too ideologically involved himself to be able to write about it in a contemplative manner. But is there somebody who could objectify a bit in an article: what has he learned in these first years and where is he going, what did he find, what would he work with, what could he not work with? This might be a bit in line with what you said this morning.

PETTIGREW: James Breedan in Boston, who is a local leader, not only articulate but very sensitive to what is going on. He's a reluctant leader. He would rather not be the leader--he's the leader because either he does it, or no one does. He's an Episcopal minister.

BELL: One problem, of course, is that there is no one movement--it has so many different parts, comes from so many different sources that you don't need an outsider to pull it all together.

MAYER: Could I comment on what Mr. Pettigrew just said and also on what Mr. Moynihan said earlier. It seems to me that certainly one of the things that has happened in this movement is really for the first time in American society, I think, the first time in a long time, the tremendous involvement of all the churches in a social movement, and it seems to me that this is an absolutely essential aspect of what is going on, and somebody should cover that. The churches and the young people, for instance.

HUGHES: Well, both the participation and the leadership and the succession of participation and leadership in the Negro movement is a very fundamental one. I mean the succession from Urban League to NAACP to CORE.

MAYER: And it's effect on the white Community.

HUGHES: It's like the succession in Europe from socialism, various revisionist movements, on down.

MAYER: This is a very peculiar aspect and a very important one. It seems to me the first time that ministers have something to talk to the young people about, they listen to and vice versa. There are all sorts of very interesting developments that somebody ought to cover.

PARSONS: I'll cite one interesting little fact. A nun, the first nun whose doctoral dissertation I had ever supervised, made a most interesting study of parish priests in the Boston Archdiocese with reference to their attitudes toward the social obligation of the church at parish level, and so on. The most diagnostic, single question she found was asking the priest whether he felt an obligation to help a Negro family find housing in the area of his parish. The socially minded all came up and said yes, whether they are Catholics or not, it doesn't matter. The older, ritualistically-minded priest said, this is none of my affair.

HUGHES: We were interviewing in West Englewood in Chicago nearly 20 years ago, and we were asking people, among other things, do you fear the invasion of Negroes here and what do you think will happen and they said, "Oh, no, Father Connelly won't allow them." But at least it wouldn't be bad to have sort of a vicar involved in this. He knows this story of the Church because his own volume on the southern parish took great to-do and great business to get it published. No Catholic publisher wanted to publish it. We finally published it at the University of Chicago, and then some of our (people) had to explain to them that it wasn't in market for press.

GEERTZ: Also, the second volume, as you know, was never published.

Mr. Stephen R. Graubard
Editor
Daedalus
Journal of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences
7 Linden Street
Harvard University
Cambridge, Massachusetts

Dear Mr. Graubard:

I have now had a chance to read through the transcript of the Planning Committee meeting held by the American Academy of Arts and Sciences. The quality of the discussion deepens my regret that I was unable to accept your invitation to attend.

I cannot even attempt to comment at all fully on the transcript. I shall jot down a few rather random reactions which will, in some measure I suppose, reflect the concerns which seem most practically pressing to me, as much as anything else.

(1) Of the matters you discussed, three interest me most deeply, and I shall hope that the Academy will pursue them. One is the line of inquiry opened up by Professor Freund, the need for (page 63) a "theoretical framework" of a "philosophical sort."

(2) A second is the terribly important area that your discussants properly emphasized of institutional or structural rigidities, economic and otherwise. I would hope here that you might consider, if feasible, some regional analysis and even comparison.

(3) The third I can suggest by reference to Professor Erikson's eloquent statements (beginning at 64) on the problem of identity, and I would hope that the analysis (or analyses) might, if it seemed on working out it should, go as far, and with his own evident sympathy and even love, into the issue as Erikson did when he pointed to Ghandi and the "very dangerous business" (page 78). I strongly hope for but worriedly wonder about the correctness of Mr. Moynehan's off-hand remark (87), "they are going to have good lives."

(4) Moynehan's contributions throughout were of the first order, and so I feel free to stand off from another of his dicta (86), about the prime importante of church action. The Washington outlook has its own distortions. You have to come to grips with both the concept and the actuality of "the church," and I would rather like it if the Academy did take this one on. One maybe correct way of looking at what happened in 1963-64 is to see it as the success of the administrative bureaucracy of the churches in securing freedom to act in civil rights, and hopefully to drag the body along.

(5) One who shares my view of democracy and all other political values as something to be constantly re-defined and newly achieved can see what has happened in the South the last decade or so as a rather bright chapter of history. Some interesting things could be done with Professor Handlin's remark on page 34. And with the fascinating comparisons of Tom Pettigrew's on page 55. (May I also add a second to his suggestion on 80 about use of the term Negro American?)

(6) As someone noted toward the end of the conference, the chief omission was the nexus of problems of municipal politics and government.

(7) The huge problem of education got discussed mostly in terms of preferential programs, and of course, as I am sure all the discussants would agree, this is only an aspect. I would suspect that something very interesting and fertile might occur if the person or persons working on education had a continuing interchange with the person or persons working on the Negro family.

(8) My sole reservation about the list of topics beginning at page ii is the study of the protest movement. Given your intention of publication in about a year, I am extraordinarily pessimistic that anybody (sic!) can manage this one, with the accuracy and the solidity and the freshness we shall all anticipate from the Academy.

Sincerely yours,

Dear Mr. Dunbar:

Thank you very much for your letter of September 15 to Mr. Graubard concerning our Negro in America transcript. Mr. Graubard is in Europe at this time and I am sending along a copy of your letter to him. I know that he will be extremely pleased with your long and interesting comment, and he will want to be in further correspondence with you upon his return looking toward a future conference on this projected issue of DAEDALUS.

Dear Dr. Reid:

I accept with pleasure your invitation to contribute to the March 1956 issue of THE ANNALS on racial desegregation and integration.

The prospectus is excellent, and I am sure the volume will be a landmark in the literature of the field.

You may expect from me by November 1, 1955, a manuscript of not more than 4,000 words on the subject "Resistance Movements and Racial Desegregation."

Kindest personal regards.

Sincerely,

Dear Mr. Fleming:

The Editor of this journal has asked me to serve as special editor for an issue on "Racial Desegregation and Integration: Process and Problems in Social Change" to be published in March, 1956. It is my privilege to ask you to be a contributor to this volume. The general purview of this issue is given in the enclosed prospectus.

We are especially interested in having you contribute an article of not more than 4,000 words on "Resistance Movements and Racial Desegregation", listed as chapter number 8 in the prospectus. The indicated scope of this chapter is for the author's general guidance and does not represent any limitation of interpretation that he must follow. The manuscript must be received on or before November 1, 1955.

As you may know, THE ANNALS is unable to pay its authors for their articles. Authors will receive, however, one cloth-bound and ten paper-bound issues of the volume. Because the journal does reach a very wide and influential segment of the American public, a group that would be intellectually and socially interested in your contribution, I am not hesitant in asking you to share in the making of what should be a significant publication. THE ANNALS is printed in editions of about 17,000 and goes to some 16,000 members and subscribers, including more than 4,000 libraries within this country and abroad.

I shall be very pleased fi you can join us by writing the article indicated. Will you advise me as soon as possible, addressing your reply to me at Haverford College, Haverford, Pennsylvania?

Sincerely yours,

Ira De A. Reid

THE ANNALS OF THE AMERICAN ACADEMY OF POLITICAL AND SOCIAL SCIENCE

Prospectus for Issue of March, 1956

"Racial Desegregation and Integration; Process and Problems in Social Change"

Editor for the Issue: Ira De A. Reid, Haverford College.

Manuscripts due: November 1, 1955.

A. PERSPECTIVE

The United States Supreme Court's decision of May 17, 1954 which declared segregation in the public schools of this nation to be an unconstitutional procedure, may be regarded as another great charter of human freedom. As such a charter it is deemed to have a generality and adaptability upon which the whole pattern of racial statuses in the United States may be woven. The decision is interpreted as expressing a general rule, against which certain statutes of the past are rendered null and void and new statutes are to become elaborations, qualifications, exceptions, and accommodations to circumstance. The decision may well be the harbinger of significant changes in political-human relations in this country.

The fabric of this decision has been woven over the years. Public policy, states' rights, decrees of judges, acts of legislatures, opinion popular and unpopular have all entered into its design. Along a score of fronts, educational, economic, political and social, its abstractions meet concrete situations and in the impact each will affect the other. The decision's trim yet tangled actuality is a product rather of the years than of the moment. As a design it reveals a society at peace with confusion, a surge towards a common objective. It has a relevancy, an intricacy, an arresting quality which no blue print could ever possess. Its ideal is a reference for social justice. Its logic is the logic of things that change.

What, then, is its actual meaning for social life in the United States? What are the matters of immediate and practical concern which demand rational action and realistic planning? In general, we see two processes at work--desegregation and integration. Desegregation we regard as a neutralizing process that must occur when groups have been prevented from having equal and harmonious relations with other groups, races, ages, religions, sexes or classes because of edicts or customs which have limited the character and extent of their interrelationships. The segregated society may be typified by separate schools for races of people, "white" primaries, denial of equal access to places of public accommodation, laws preventing racial intermarriage, and other procedures and rules that may restrict a group's full participation in a society because of its race, creed, or nationality. Desegregation, the removal of these barriers, is an essential prerequisite to integration. The former is achieved to the degree that it succeeds in modifying the social institutions, the personal behaviors, and the value systems which supported it.

Integration, however, is the situation which exists when men in society are breaking down the aforementioned barriers while moving toward the full acceptance of all people without reference to their racial, religious, or national differences. It is the process of achieving full equality of status and condition. The elimination of "Negro jobs" or "white jobs" in employment, the establishment of an "open occupancy" tenancy program in housing, are but first steps toward integration.

Ultimately, integration is an ideal condition which ceases to exist when it is acheived. In a culturally healthy situation the condition may be achieved so gradually and so effectively as to attract little or no popular attention or opposition. In other situations the transition may be fraught with real or imagined dangers. Whether the transition is easy or rugged, the change always involves some social cost to the existing system. As a consequence, the social community is called upon to determine 1) how far integration should go; 2) under what conditions it is to be achieved; and, 3) within what limitations it shall occur

We want to look at racial desegregation and integration in the United States within this general purview but with specific refernce to selected aspects of achieved and predictive change. Four broad areas of the situation are to be explored, Backgrounds, Desegregation, Case Studies in Integration, and Principles for Planning. It is hoped that the articles in each section will be based upon such insights and perspectives as will represent a contribution to the study of human rights and human relations. Throughout the volume the articles should seek to answer these basic questions: What is the political, social, and economic nature of the problem with which I am dealing? What aspects of change does it involve? What major resistances have been or may be expected in achieving the desired objective in democratic human relations? The specific suggestions for the author's consideration given under each title are for his general guidance. He is not obliged to accept this preliminary formulation.

B. CHAPTER DESIGN

1. RACIAL ASPECTS OF PUBLIC POLICY. (2,000 words)

What evidence supports the contention that the United States of America for centuries has been the experimental proving ground for the principle that men irrespective of their race, creed, or national origin can live and work together harmoniously for the common good? A background article for the volume.

2. HISTORY OF RACIAL SEGREGATION IN THE UNITED STATES (4,000 words)

The formal emancipation of slaves did not bring either actual freedom or real equality. New laws were considered necessary to define the new relationships when the old caste order collapsed. What were the repressive and dicriminatory legislative acts which the 14th and 15th Amendments were designed to outlaw? What problem underlies the civil rights statutes of the several states? Treat, if possible, from the point of view of "Jim Crow" legislation, providing an adequate background for the article which follows.

3. THE U.S. SUPREME COURT AND THE SEGREGATION ISSUES. (3,000 words)

Upon what Federal constitutional provisions, what precedents, and in what issues of public policy has the Supreme Court faced the racial segregation issues? Reference might be made to the series of decisons dealing with peonage, restrictive covenants, fair trials, public accommodations, etc.

4. SEGREGATION IN AMERICAN EDUCATION: AN OVERVIEW (4,000 words)

What has happened to the racial patterning of public education in the U.S. since the first decisions of the Supreme Court dealt with the separate but equal principle? What are the problems of elementary and secondary schools adjustment? Of colleges and graduate schools?

What social inventions represent "gradual" approaches to integration? Which ones represent quasi-evasion? What have been the spill-overs into private education? Are equal educational facilities possible? Under what conditions?

II. DESEGREGATION

5. DESEGREGATION: THE NAACP STORY. (4,000 words)

For more than forty years this organization has sought to desegregate the United States' social structure. To what issues did it give priority? Why? What were its handicaps? Which issues were overcome? What areas of American life does the NAACP regard as desegregated? What remains to be done? How?

6. ORGANIZED PHILANTHROPY AND DESEGREGATION. (4,000 words)

The role forthe Fund for the Advancement of Education in making available to the public the facts and problems of segregation in public education was a singular one. Why did the FAE engage in such a venture? Are there precedents in organized philanthropy's grants in this area? What sort of mosaic is presented by such activities as the General Education Board's interest in Negro education, the Phelps-Stokes early interest in housing, the Carnegie Foundation's interest in South Africa and in public libraries, the Rosenwald Fund's general interest in problems of races, and, the Opportunity Fellowships of the Whitney Foundation, to cite a few. What significane, if any, may be attached to the fact that a high proportion of the funds supporting movements for reform in this area of human relations has come from organized philantropy?

7. LEGAL INVENTIONS AND THE DESEGREGATION PROCESS. (4,000 words)

The May 17, 1954 decision gave rise to numerous legal proposals for Southern states designed to circumvent its application. What were these legalistic resistance movements? What significance do they have for interpreting the ways in which the Supreme Court's decision may or may not be implemented in certain states?

8. RESISTANCE MOVEMENTS AND RACIAL DESEGRATION. (4,000 words)

What sorts of pressure groups and extra-legal movements now agitate against desegration? What are their arguments? Their strengths? Their weaknesses? In the past we have had such movements as the Ku Klux Klan and the various "Shirt" organizations. Today hears of the National Association for the Advancement of White People. What resistances has the Southern Regional Council noted? How may they be evaluated as factors in the end result?

9. THE FACTS OF EDUCATIONAL DESEGREGATION: S.E.R.S. (4,000 words)

The Southern Education Reporting Service is a surprise development in the desegregation arena. How did it come to be? What does it conceive to be its role? What have been its problems? What can it say about the issue of desegration as gleaned from its reporters and after 18 months of its operations?

III. CASE STUDIES IN INTEGRATION

10. POLICIES AND PRACTICES OF DISCRIMINATION COMMISSIONS. (4,000 words)

What answers to the opinion that integration cannot be legislated have been provided by the state and municipal commissions against discrimination? What sanctions are employed by such agencies in dealing with grievances arising out of unequal treatment and racial discrimination? What policies, powers, and practices may be noted as having general validity for integration programs? Could such commissions be established in Southern states? May these commissions be regarded as the consequences of such prior efforts as the use of shock-absorbing race relations consultants, and relatively powerless fair employment practices and grievances committees?

11. INTEGRATION IN ARMED SERVICES. (4,000 words)

The integration of racial personnel in various branches of the nation's armed services has been highly publicized. What problems and programs survive the remarkable achievement of the World War II period? To what extent and in what ways has the Department of Defense been able to secure and maintain the active cooperation of the civilian community in its programs? What problems of procedure and implementation remain? Where?

12. INTEGRATION IN PUBLIC AND PRIVATE HOUSING. (4,000 words)

The achievement of integration in housing goes beyond the scope of the law. Private contracts, customs, and financial arrangements, among other factors, may be clues to the extendt and nature of integration in residential areas and public and private housing. What experiences and principles stem from the nation's efforts in this field in the last quarter of a century? What contemporary programs seem to have significance for discrimination-less housing? What blocs seem most formidable?

13. INTEGRATION IN THE NATION'S CAPITOL. (4,000 words)

Washington, once called the "tarnished symbol" of human rights, has had a series of desegregation and integration pressures and programs, and no small amount of organized resistance. Some of these practices may be related to the city's geographical location, others to the nature of partisan politics, race, and a voteless community, yet others to peculiarly local customs and activities. Can the Washington story of racial segregation, desegregation, and integration be told in its full socio-historical sweep?

14. INTEGRATION IN PROFESSIONAL EDUCATION.....SMU. (4,000 words)

The Perkins School of Theology, Southern Methodist University, Dallas Texas, graduates its first integrated class in June, 1956. Through what administrative, educational, and social experiences have the university and the students moved in reaching this end? What import for the South, the nation, and education does this experience provide?

IV. PRINCIPLES FOR PLANNING

15. DESEGREGATION, INTEGRATION AND THE RACIAL COMMUNITY. (3,000 words)

What principles and problems are involved in establishing a new way of life for the minority group community? From studies of all-colored and ghetto communities can we distill principles that have validity for interpreting the problem ahead? What losses, what gains, and for whom may be expected? What resistances may be found: What values are affected?

16. THE INTEGRATION PRINCIPLE AND NON-NEGRO MINORITIES. (3,000 words)

Previous decisions of the Supreme Court in this field have had meaning for interpretation of the statutes of other minorities than those affected by the letter of the decrees. What other minority groups are affected in what ways by this decision of the Court? Indians, Oriental-Americans, Spanish-Americans? May it be said that a common principle of integration has a common interpretation for such groups? Is there a universe of discourse within which one could treat these practical situations as aspects of integration as an ideal of American society?

17. RACIAL POLICIES AND INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS. (3,000 words)

What sorts of international reactions attend the statement and the revision of racial policies in the United States? What positive and negative results illustrate the effect of the Court's decision (and its subsequent hearings) on this nation's status as a defender of human rights?

18. SOCIAL SCIENCES AND THE SEGREGATION PROCESS. (3,000 words)

What have the social sciences as sciences rather than as moral philosophies to offer as blue prints for communities and institutions moving through the segregation-desegregation-integration processes? To what degrees an in what ways may unanticipated consequences affect planning in this area of human relations?

19. RACIAL DESEGREGATION AND INTEGRATION: A BIBLIOGRAPHY OF CONTEMPORARY STUDIES AND PROPOSALS. (4,000 words)

A catalog of significant books, monographs, court decisions, briefs, amicus curiae, and unpublished documents in the general field of desegregation and integration. Major emphasis is to be given to the processes, minor emphasis to the areas, education, public accommodations, employment, housing, etc.

Mr. E. Gordon Alderfer, Executive Assistant
The American Academy of Political and Social Science
3937 Chestnut Street
Philadelphia 4, Pa.

Dear Mr. Alderfer:

Our staff has just emerged from an extended series of conferences, and this is the first opportunity I have had to reply to your letter of January 17.

We should be happy to cooperate in publicizing the forthcoming issue of THE ANNALS. As it happens, the Southern Regional Council has a binding policy that names and addresses on our mailing lists may not leave the office. However, we would be glad to enclose descriptive material in the mailing of our monthly publication New South; no additional postage would be required if the mailing piece would not exceed one ounce. Alternatively we could address and mail the material separately in this office at cost.

I hope we can work out an arrangement within the limits of our policy to further the distribution of your March issue and will look forward to hearing from you.

Sincerely,

Harold C. Fleming,
Assistant Director.

Dear Mr. Mitchell:

The March issue of THE ANNALS of the American Academy is to be devoted to a scholarly discussion of the problems of desegregation and reintegration. Realizing that your organization and its members are very much interested in this problem and that the Conference's activities have meant so very much to the development of opinion in the South it occurred to me to inquire whether it would be possible to obtain from you a list of your membership so that we could inform them of this publication as well as the general program of the Academy.

If this could be arranged within the framework of your organization policies we would be happy to pay whatever costs are involved, including the addressing of our envelopes. If you publish a directory of your membership we could of course arrange to do the addressing in our own office.

We are very eager to complete arrangements for sending out information about this publication and it would be doubly helpful therefore to hear from you at your earliest convenience. As a matter of fact I would be happy to have you wire me collect.

Let me take this opportunity to express the good wishes of the Academy to you and your own organization. If at any time in the future we could be of any assistance to you I sincerely hope you will get in touch with us.

Cordially yours,

Gordon Alderfer
